"In our own country there are four states where women have exactly the same voting privileges as men, and where they are eligible to all offices. These are Wyoming, which, as a territory, adopted woman suffrage away back in 1869 and insisted that it be made secure in its constitution when it was admitted to statehood in 1890; Colorado which adopted it in 1893; Idaho and Utah, which established it in 1896.

"The women of the world are awake, and never was there such a spirit of solidarity manifested as now. To the ideal of the 'fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man' we must now add the 'sisterhood of woman.'"

MICHIGAN IS EIGHTH

In the Union in the Development of Her Water Power.

This state has 649 developed water powers. It has 26 powers greater than 1,000 horse-power each, and in amount of water power developed is the eighth state in the union.

This information was made public last week in a report of the conservation commission, which has made a detailed census of the power development throughout the county. The total power developments in the country aggregate 5,500,000 horse-power, of which approximately one twenty-seventh is in Michigan.

The greatest development in the state at this time is that of the Grand Rapids-Muskegon Company on the Muskegon river. There the total development is 50,940 horse-power, saving approximately 500,000 tons of coal every year. The second development is that of the Michigan-Lake Superior Company, at the Soo, with 23,000 horse-power, and also that of the Chandler-Dunbar Company, with a development of 3,450 horse-power. The third is the Commonwealth Company on the Kalamazoo river, with 14,300 horsepower. Next place is held by the Indiana and Michigan Electric Company, which has under construction a 6,000 horse-power development on the St. Joseph river. The same company also has another development on the St. Joseph of 2,000 horse-power.—Cheboygan Democrat.

CLASSIFY TROUT STREAMS

Plan that is Now Purposed to be Carried Out

As a Result of the Junket of Fish Commission and Committees

A classification of streams, as a result of which brook trout will not be planted in rainbow trout streams and vice versa, may result from the recent junket of the fish commission and the fish committee of the house and senate.

If this plan is adopted radical changes in the game laws will be very apt to follow. For instance, brook and rainbow trout are not in season at exactly the same time and it is probable that different closed seasons would be arranged.

Rainbow trout very generally have only finished spawning a a short time when the present open season begins and are apt to be soft and flabby. They would be in much better condition if it were not possible to catch them until a later period.

The law proposed would define "brook" and "rainbow" streams with the open seasons. It would then be possible to fish in streams of either class only at times proposed.

As brook and rainbow trout will not live together, there would be no great difficulty in separating the seasons. Streams in which the rainbows are planted soon lose all the brook trout, the more savage rainbows driving out their weaker brothers.—Free Press.

MERCHANT'S ASSOCIATION

Formed to Promote the Best Interests of Charlevoix

At a meeting of business men held Friday night, an organization was formed to be known as the Charlevoix Retail Merchant's Association. This organization is planned to promote the general welfare of our city along business lines by all working together for the common good. The officers elected are:

President—Lou See.
Vice president—J. L. Crane.
Treasurer—Kurt Miller.
Secretary—not yet selected.

Another meeting will be held Friday night for the purpose of still further perfecting the organization.

GOOD ROADS INSTITUTE HELD

Ten Out of the Sixteen Commissioners Present

ATTENDANCE OF CITIZENS WAS LIGHT

Deputy State Highway Commissioner Rogers in Charge

County Road Commissioner Bradford of Manistee Explained the Workings of the County System in this County

Saturday, the county good roads institute was held at the court house, Deputy State Highway Commissioner Rogers being in charge. The attendance of highway commissioners was good, taking into consideration the difficulty of traveling in our county in the winter, ten out of the sixteen being present. What was disappointing was the lack of attendance of other citizens, not over a coupie of dozen being present.

John Bradford, county road commissioner of Manistee county, was present and explained the workings of the county system in his county. Mr. Bradford said that in the past six years, under the county system, they had built fifty miles of good permanent roads and had received from the state, for state reward, seventeen thousand dollars. Work of drawing the gravel is done in the winter time, furnishing employment to the taxpayers and keeping the money expended right at home, so in the end, the money is re-distributed and in addition the state reward money is brought back to the township, besides they have a good road. Another feature of the county system is the fact that each township is not compelled to buy costly machinery, as one machine does for the entire county.

Mr. Roger's talk was along the lines of road building, giving instructions how to build a road which would meet the requirements of the state highway department and enable the township to draw the state reward. Mr. Rogers also quoted from the decisions of the courts on the powers and duties of highway commissioners, explaining many different points which arise in their work.

It was a meeting which should have been largely attended, as in one month more, the people of Charlevoix county will be called upon to decide whether or not they will adopt the county system. In its favor it may be said that every road that is built under it, is a road and not a patching up of a piece, that what money is actually expended in road building can be more economically spent by the county, as a whole, than by the different township units. Opponents of the system make the point that their roads will be the last built and that the cost of administration will be heavy. These are problems to be thought out before you cast your vote, but don't forget a good road anywhere in Charlevoix county increases the value of this county as a whole, and every permanent road that is built will be between a market point and some farm, and each year more and more will be built and the milage will increase, until in a few years all the main travelled roads will be permanent ones.

Mrs. A. N. Chase was called to Traverse City last week on account of her daughter, Belle, being sick.

Our new neighbors, Joseph Pletke, has purchased two cows, one from Will Burns and one from John Zylstra. Price paid for both $82.00.

Edmund Shapton is almost done drawing logs to Spayds mill. Mr. Shapton intends to make some improvements to his barn this summer.

Luther Trimble and wife have got back from Boyne City and East Jordan, where they have been visiting relatives. They intend to start for their home in the Canadian north west about March 8.

FROM CLARION.

Mrs. Gregg Vantilberg visited friends in Harbor Springs last week.

Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Buckley have moved back to their farm from Wabmeme.

Mr. and Mrs. Malcolm Ellis of Boyne, visited friends at Walloon on Saturday.

Miss Benham of Harbor Springs, spent Sunday with Mrs. Frank Bridgewater.

There was no school in the grammar room on Monday, owing to the illness of the teacher, A. B. Wickett.

On Saturday evening a cap social was held at the Wallnon Lake school house. The proceeds, about $20, will be devoted to the library.

Mrs. H. A. Bixby of Walloon, who has been suffering for some time from injuries received in a fall on the ice, is very low and but little hope is entertained for her recovery.

The applicants for the position of mail-carrier on the new route to be opened between Clarion and Springvale on April 1, took the necessary examination at Charlevoix on Saturday. They were: Mr. Wood, worth of Springvale, C. H. Miller, Joseph Eckstrom, Christian Brown and Mr. Rulf of Clarion.

FROM NORWOOD.

C. H. Ferguson and wife are home from the west.

Rev. Yost is at Barnard holding revival meetings.

Miss Ethel Knight of Charlevoix, is visiting friends here.

Joe Hotlicheck moved his family back from camp last Thursday.

Mrs. Henry VanDusan visited at James O'Brien's, Charlevoix, last week.

The farmers in this vicinity begin to wonder where they will get their ice.

Henry Wagner has about 500 acres of sugar beets contracted in his territory.

Frank Corman, George Hollicheck and Neil Chase went to work in Spayd's mill this week.

Mrs. Dice and Mrs. Haskin returned home last week after six weeks visit at South Bend, Indiana.

COUNTY NORMAL NOTES.

Florence Sheldon was absent on account of illness last week.

The normal class will give a reception to the alumni, March 12.

The second semester's work in history, geography and physiology is now underway. The class has been especially interested in the theory about the formation of the earth.

Miss Leah Persons completed a successful term of school in the Bill's district, south of town and is spending her vacation at home.—Charlevoix County Herald. Miss Persons was a member of the normal class of 08.

Wednesday morning a telephone was received from Mr. Steele of Advance, stating that the teacher, Miss Pleasant Geiken, was ill and unable to continue her work. Clare Finucan drove over in the afternoon to act as substitute in Miss Geiken's place for a week.

FROM PHELPS

Archie Risley is some better.

John Zillstraw lost one of his cows last week.

Mr. Hymun is sawing wood for Charlie Stevens.

Mr. Haines was in Central Lake on business Monday.

Charlie Stevens was in Charlevoix on business Monday.

Miss Agnes O'Neill is home from East Jordan, for a few days.

Archie Risley has finished hauling logs from his farm to Phelps.

Miss Carrie Himebaugh was visiting Miss Lena Alles at her home in Banks last week.

Will Bradshaw, formerly of Phelps, is working at Chestonia, Antrim county, at present.

Messrs. John Doctor and Will LeComp have cut a nice lot of block and pole wood this winter.

A nephew, of Mrs. Fred Mason and Charlie Stevens, from the south part of the state, is visiting them.

Mrs. Mary Hayner is sadly afflicted with the travelling rheumatism. It has troubled her for over a year.

Mrs. George Haynes received a letter from her daughter Birdie in Traverse City last week. She is well and getting along nicely.

Eight cords of wood is the amount that Dick O'Neill delivered in one load last week and he was ready for work the next morning as usual.

Dick O'Neill has taken the job of loading the logs of the Central Lake Lumber company at Phelps. He expects to begin loading Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. John T. Chellis expect to leave for Seattle, Washington, this week. Mrs. Chellis is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Ostrum.

Bert Thompson has moved the Cleland house from Phelps to his farm, a distance of about three miles. Bert Ingalls assisted him in moving it.

The members of the Holiness church cut a very nice pile of wood for their minister last week, while he was away. Mr. Herndon was the man that owned the sawing machine.

Uncle John O'Neill is still obliged to stay in the house with a badly sprained ankle. His leg and ankle is badly swelled. Uncle John is nearly seventy years old, which accounts for his not getting along faster.

George Haynes received some nice samples of seed from Iowa. Last year he received a packet of white wonder field beans. From them he harvested a nice lot of seed which ripened very evenly. Badly mixed seed is dear at any price.

FROM SOUTH CHARLEVOIX

Jesse DeWitt was up from Bellaire Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. Platt Webster spent Saturday at his father's.

Jesse DeWitt expects to leave for California in a couple of weeks.

Mrs. Winick of Oyster Bay, was visiting Mrs. George Fay last Friday.

A surprise party was given Mr. Wooley Monday evening, it being his fiftieth birthday.

Several of our people attended a pot luck supper given Doctor and Mrs. Bartlett in their new home last Friday evening. A jolly good time was reported.

BALD HEADS NOT WANTED

Baldness Is too Generally Considered a Sign of Advanced Age.

A bald headed person does not have an equal chance with one blessed with a healthy head of hair because baldness is too generally accepted as an indication of old age. Many large corporations have established an age limit, and refuse to take men over 35 years of age as new employees.

Almost 65 per cent of bald headed people may regain a good head of healthy hair if they will follow our advice and accept our offer. We have a remedy that we positively garuntee to grow hair on any head unless the roots of the hair are entirely dead, their follicles closed, and the scalp has become glazed and shiny. We want people to try this remedy at our risk, with the distinct understanding that unless it does exactly what we claim it will, and gives satisfaction in every respect, we shall make no charge for the remedy used during the trial.

We know exactly what we are talking about, and with this offer back of our statements no one should scoff, doubt our word or hesitate to put our remedy to an actual test.

We want everyone in Charlevoix, who is suffering from any scalp or hair trouble, dandruff, falling hair or baldness to try our Rexall "93" Hair Tonic. We want them to use it regularly—say until three bottles have been used and if it does not eradicate dandruff, cleanse and refresh the scalp, tighten the hair in its roots, and grow new hair, we will return every cent paid us for the remedy for the mere asking. There is no formality expected, and we exact no obligation from the user whatever.

We are established right here in Charlevoix and make this offer with a full understanding that our business success entirely depends upon the sort of treatment we accord our customers, and we would not dare make the above offer unless we were positively certain that we could substantiate it in every particular. Literary Notes

What the Emmanuel Movement Really Is

"What is this idea that has aroused a storm of opposition and approval from one end of the country to the other?" says Woman's Home Companion for March, and then proceeds to answer its own question completely and effectively. The movement, started by Doctor Worchester in Emmanuel church, Boston, has spread, until now it embraces seventy-five churches. It is brought out plainly in this article that, while the mind's influence over the body was demonstrated centuries ago, the Emmanuel Movement is an absolute departure, because it is a combination of religion and medicine—the physician and the minister working hand in hand to relieve the sufferings of mankind. Every step of the movement has been undertaken under the auspices of the physician. Its great value to the church is brought out clearly. In this March issue, Dr. William B. Parker says, in part:

"Its significance to the church is hard to overestimate. It means turning the minds of men back to the church for practical help and succor. To the teacher, the student the reader, the thinker, it means having a new topic added to his interests, a new region opened to development. It is comparable to the popular discovery of psychology twenty years ago, when that became the most interesting subject of reading in the world. It means clearing away mist and confusion from a subject of great importance and letting in new light upon the working of our minds. It means strengthening each man's confidence in his ability to help himself and his fellows. To the clergyman it has given an effective argument for the power of the spirit the efficacy of prayer and the presence of God. To the medical profession it has done perhaps the greatest service in checking, if not curing, the materialism which was so general in its ranks."

There is more catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

Penal Servitude For Life.

It is a popular error in England that penal servitude "for life" means in reality "for twenty years." Of course it is no such thing. Penal servitude for life means precisely what it says, neither more nor less. True, all life sentences are reconsidered at the end of twenty years, and if the convict's conduct has been all that it ought to be during the whole of that long period he may be tentatively released on a ticket of leave. But obviously that is a very different thing from letting him go free altogether. He is still a convict and will remain one to the end of his days. He has to report himself every month until death frees him, and if he swerves from the narrow path ever so little—and is found out—he goes straight back to jail without even the formality of a trial, to be released, as a general rule, never again.—London Answers.

"Jessica!" he cried and sprang to his feet.

"I have watched every day and listened every night," she said. "I knew that you would come—that you must come back!"

"If I had never gone, Jessica!" he exclaimed. "Then I might have seen my father. But I didn't know"—

She clasped her hands together. "You know now? You remember it all?"

He shook his head. "I have been there"—he pointed to the hillside—"and

"The prodigal is yourself."

I have guessed who it is that lies there. I know I sinned against him and against myself and left him to die unforgiving. That is what the statue said to me, as he must have said, 'I am no more worthy to be called thy son.'"

"Ah," she cried, "he knew and he forgave you, Hugh! His last thought was of your coming. That is why I carved the figure there."

"You carved it?" he exclaimed. She bent her forehead to his hands as they shaped her own.

"The prodigal is yourself," she said. "I modeled it once before when you came back to him, in the time you have forgotten. But I destroyed it"—the words were very low now—"on my wedding day."

His hands released hers, and, looking up, she saw, even in the moonlight, that with the last word his face had gone ghastly white. At the sight timidity, maidenly reserve, fell, and all the woman in her rushed uppermost. She lifted her arms and clasped his face.

"Hugh," she cried, "can't you remember? Don't you understand? Think! I was blind, dear, blind. A white bandage was across my eyes, and you came to me in a shaded room. Why did you come to me?"

A spark seemed to dart through his brain like the prickling discharge from a Leyden jar. He saw himself standing, facing a figure with bandaged eyes. He saw the bandage torn off, felt that yielding body in his arms, heard a voice—her voice—crying: "Hugh, Hugh! My husband!" and felt those lips pressed to his own in the tense stir of a darkened room.

A cry broke from his lips: "Yes, yes, I remember! Jessica, my wife!" His arms went round her, and, with a little sob, she nestled close to him on the doorstep.

* * * * * * *

That hour on the mountain side under the stars had left Harry possessed of a melee of perplexing emotions. Dreaming and waking Jessica's face hung before his eyes, her voice sounded in his ear. The future held no longer any doubt; it held only her. Where was that future to be? Back in the city to which his painful curiosity had so lately driven him? This lay no longer in his own choice. It was for her to decide now—Jessica, his wife.

He looked up transfixed, for she stood there before him ankle deep in a brown whirlwind of leaves from a frost stung oak, her hand to her cheek in an adorable gesture that he knew, her lips parted and eager.

"I wanted so to find you," she said. "I have so many, many things to say."

"It is all wonderfully strange and new," he said: "It is as though I had rubbed Aladdin's lamp and suddenly had my heart's desire. How could I have thrown my pearl away?"

"We are not to think of that," she protested, "never, never any more."

"You are right," he rejoined cheerfully. "It is what is to come that we must think of." He paused an instant; then he said:

"Last night when you told me of the white house in the aspens I did not tell you that I had just come from there—from Aniston."

She made an exclamation of wonder. "Tell me," she said.

Sitting with her hand in his, he told of that night's experiences, the fear that had held him as he gazed at her portrait in the library, the secret of the Korean desk that had solaced his misery and sent him back to the father he was not to see.

At mention of the will she threw out her hand with a passionate gesture. "The money is not mine!" she cried. "It is yours! He intended to change it! He told me so the day he died! Oh, if you think I"—

"No, no," he said gently. "There is no resentment, no false pride, in my love, Jessica. I am thinking of you and of Aniston. You would have me go back, would you not?"

She looked up, smiling, and slowly shook her head. "You are a blind guesser," she said. "Don't you think I know what is in your mind? Not Aniston, Hugh. Some time, but not now—not yet. It is nearer than that."

His eyes bowed into hers. "You understand. Yes, it is here. This is where I must finish my light first. Yesterday I would have left Smoky mountain forever because you were here. Now"—

"I will help you," she said. "All the world besides counts nothing if only we are together. I could live in a cabin here on the mountain always, in a forest of Arden, till I grow old and want nothing but that—and you."

As he did not answer, she faced him with crimsoning cheeks; then, reading his look, she suddenly threw her arms about his neck.

"Hugh," she cried, "we belong to each other now! There is no one else to consider, is there? I want to be to you what I haven't been—to bear things with you and help you!"

He kissed her eyes and hair. "You have helped, you do help me, Jessica!" he urged. "But I am jealous for your love. It must not be offended. The town of Smoky Mountain must not sneer—and it would sneer now."

"Let it!" she exclaimed resentfully. "As if I would care!"

"But I would care," he said softly. "I want to climb a little higher first."

She was silent a moment, her fingers twisting the fallen leaves. "You don't want them to know that I am your wife?"

"Not yet—till I can see my way."

She nodded and smiled, and the cloud lifted from her face. "You must know best," she said. "This is what I shall do, then. I shall leave the sanitarium tomorrow. The people there are nothing to me, but the town of Smoky Mountain is yours, and I must be a part of it too. I am going to the Mountain Valley House. Mrs. Halloran will take care of me." She sprang to her feet as she added, "I shall go to see her about it now."

He rose and walked with her through the bracken to the road. They came out to the driveway just below the trail that led to the Knob. The bank was high, and, leaping first, he held up his arms to her and lifted her lightly down. In the instant as she lay in his arms he bent and kissed her on the lips.

Hallelujah Jones was in his element.

Neither noted two figures walking together that at that moment rounded the bend of the road a little way above. They were Tom Felder and Dr. Brent. Both men saw the kiss and instinctively drew back. The doctor noted now the telltale flush on his companion's face.

"We have surprised a romance," he said as the two unconscious figures disappeared down the curving stretch. "Who is the man?"

"He is the one we have been talking about."

Felder nodded. "His cabin is just below here on the hillside."

"Good Lord!" ejaculated the doctor. "What an infernal pity! What's his name?"

"Hugh Stires."

"Stires?" the other repeated. "Stires? How odd!" He stood a moment, tapping his suit case with his stick. Suddenly he took the lawyer's arm and led him into the sidepath.

"Come," he said, "I want to show you something."

He led the way quickly to the Knob, where he stopped, as much astonished as his companion, for he had known nothing of the statue. They read the words chiseled on its base. "The prodigal son," said Felder.

"Now look at the name on the headstone," said the physician.

Felder's glance lifted from the stone to peer through the screening bushes to the cabin on the shelf below and returned to the other's face with quick comprehension. "You think"—

"Who could doubt it? 'I will arise and go unto my father.' The old man's whim to be buried here had a meaning, after all. The statue is Miss Holme's work—nobody in Smoky Mountain could do it—and I've seen her modeling in clay at the sanitarium. What we saw just now is the key to what might have been a pretty riddle if we had ever looked farther than our noses. It's a case of a clever rascal and damnable propinquity. The ward has fallen in love with the black sheep."

Chapter 24

HALLELUJAH JONES was in his element. With his wheezy melodeon, his gasoline flare and his wild earnestness, he crowded the main street of the little mining town. He had not lacked for listeners here, for he was a new sensation. When he lit his flare in the courthouse square at dusk on the second evening the office of the Mountain Valley House was emptied and the barrooms and gaming tables well nigh deserted of their patrons.

Jessica had seen the clustering crowd from the hotel entrance. Mrs. Halloran had welcomed her errand that day and given her her best room, a chamber overlooking the street. She had persuaded her visitor to spend the afternoon and insisted that she stay to supper, "just to see how she would like it for a steady diet." Now, as Jessica passed along toward the mountain road the spectacle chained her feet on the outskirts of the gathering. She watched and listened with a preoccupied mind. She was thinking that on her way to the sanitarium she would cross to the cabin for a good night word with the man upon whom her every thought centered.

As it happened, however, Harry was at that moment very near her. Alone on the mountain, the perplexing conflict of feeling had again descended upon him. He had fought it, but it had prevailed and at nightfall had driven him down to the town, where the street preacher now held forth. He stood alone, unnoted, a little distance away near the courthouse steps, where by reason of the crowd Jessica could see neither him nor the dog, which sniffed at the heels of the circle of bystanders as if to inquire casually of salvation.

Numbers were swelling now, and the street preacher, shaking back his long hair, drew a premonitory, wavering chord from his melodeon and struck up a gospel song. The song ended, he mounted his camp stool to propound his usual fiery text.

The watcher by the steps was gazing with a strange, alert intentness. Something in the scene held him enthralled. Hallelujah Jones knew the melodramatic value of contrast. As his mood called he passed abruptly from exhortation to song, from prayer to fulmination, and he embellished his harangue with anecdotes drawn from his lifelong campaign against the arch enemy of souls. Of what he had said the solitary observer had been quite unconscious. It was the ensemble—the repetition of something experienced somewhere before—that appealed to him. Suddenly, however, a chance phrase pierced to his understanding.

Another moment and he was leaning forward, his eyes fixed, his breath straining at his breast. For each word of the speaker now was knocking a sledge hammer blow upon the blank wall in his brain. Hallelujah Jones had launched into the recital of a story which, though the stern charge of a bishop had kept him silent as to name and locality, yet, possessing the vividness of an actual experience, had lost little in the telling. It was the tale of an evening when he had peered through the tilted window of a chapel and seen his dissolute rector gambling on the table of the Lord.

The words shrieked themselves through Harry's brain. Harry Sanderson, not Hugh Stires! Not an outcast! Not criminal, thief and forger! The curtain was rent. The dead wall in his brain was down, and the real past swept over him in an ungovernable flood. Hallelujah Jones had furnished the clew to the maze. His story was the last great wave, which had crumbled all at once the cliff of oblivion that the normal process of the recovered mind had been stealthily undermining. Harry Sanderson at last knew his past and all of puzzlement and distress that it had held.

Harry Sanderson, not Hugh Stires!

Shaking in every limb and feeling all along the courthouse wall like a drunken man, he made his way to the further deserted street. A passerby would have shrunk at sight of his face and his turning eyes.

For these months he, the Rev. Henry Sanderson, disgraced, had suffered eclipse, had been sunk out of sight and touch and hearing like a stone in a pool. For these months—through an accidental facial resemblance and a fortuitous concurrence of circumstances—he had owned the name and ignominy of Hugh Stires. And Jessica? Deceived no less than he, dating her piteous error from that mistaken moment when she had torn the bandage from her eyes on her wedding day, she had never seen the real Hugh in Smoky Mountain. She must learn the truth. Yet how to tell her? How could he tell her all?

At any hour yesterday, hard as the telling must have been, he could have told her. Last night the hour passed. How could he tell her now? Yet she

THE latest move of the liquor interests is to seek to make the farmers believe that the enactment of prohibitory laws will destroy their market for farm products. Let us study the facts. The official reports show that over 80,000,000 less gallons of whiskey were manufactured in the United States last year than one year previous—which, in itself, proves that prohibition does prohibit and at the same time corn has reached a high notch in the market price.

Another factor in the enactment of prohibitory laws that appeals to the farmer is the fact that in many of the states which have adopted temperance measures, distillers are considering the advisibility of utilizing their plants in the manufacture of denatured or industrial alcohol opening up a wide market, not only for the staple products of the farm which now are used for the manufacture of whiskey, but of other products which now go to waste, besides furnishing a cheaper product from which to obtain power, fuel and light.

CAUSE OF MUDDY ROADS.

Value of Good Drainage and Ideal Curvature For Fine Highways.

The following sectional drawings, made by J. D. Sherwood, president of the Spokane County Good Roads club, illustrate the cause of Spokane's muddy streets and country roads.

Fig. 1 shows the ideal curvature, the highest point of which is eight inches above the level of the curbs indicated by the dotted lines and eighteen inches above the gutters. A glance shows that the crown is raised sufficiently high to afford good drainage to the gutters. This curve is the chief factor of a good road.

In Fig. 2 the dotted line shows the curve that is followed by the city of Spokane, the highest point being only two inches above the level of the curbs, making the street too flat for good drainage. The ragged line shows the result of a year's wear. The earth sloughs off to the sides, and a depression occurs in the center, creating the muddy conditions.

Fig. 3 shows the familiar hump left after laying water or gas mains, which further prevents drainage to the gutters.

In Fig. 4 the black line shows the ideal curvature of the government specifications, affording the best possible drainage.

A representative of the United States government who lectured at Spokane on this subject remarked that in building roadways the three important points to bear in mind were: First, provide for good drainage; second, provide for good drainage, and, third, provide for good drainage.

The Question of Local Option

This space will be devoted to the discussion of the question of local option. Only matter which is furnished us by regular representatives of each faction will be used as we see fit. The COURIER is not responsible for anything appearing under this head, nor does it in any way represent the policy of this paper.

"What leading Wexford county business men think of county prohibition." The foregoing declaration is the heading of a letter sheet circular which is evidently being circulated throughout the state for the purpose of creating opposition to local option. This circular contains the names of George Chapman, cashier of the Peoples Savings Bank, E. L. Metheany, mayor of the city and agent of the Grand Rapids & Indiana Railroad Company, H. E. Ahlrich, police commissioner, W. W. Mitchell, of Mitchell Brothers & Co., Dr. B. H. McMullen, physician and former mayor, Rev. E. A. Le Febvre, pastor of St. Ann's Catholic church, Rev. M. L. Leucke, pastor of Emmanuel Lutheran church and Rev. E. J. Millington, pastor of the Congregational church.

This circular seeks to make it appear that the above named persons signed their names to statements touching the operations of the local option law in Cadillac and Wexford county. The Evening News has not been able as yet to personally interview all the men whose names are printed on this circular, but it has interviewed most of them this forenoon, and they authorize the declaration to be emphatically made that most of the statements over their signatures are untrue, that they did not make or authorize any statements to be made over their signatures and did not know they were to be made.

From one or two of the men whose names were given on this circular we learn that a man who represented himself as the representative of an Ohio newspaper syndicate called at their doors or called them up through the telephone, several weeks ago. This man asked some general questions as to the local option law. In one instance he asked whether or not whiskey could now be bought in Cadillac, and when told that he could probably get whiskey if he wanted it the conversation ended. In not a single instance did this representative of the liquor league of the state, whom it now appears the fellow was, give a truthful statement of what was said to him. Here are some of the statements the circular contains;

"Until recently Cadillac was one of the best towns of its size in Michigan. It was a well-governed city, the lumbering interests brought thousands of dollars to the county that was distributed among the merchants. Since county prohibition went into effect there are about two hundred vacant houses in Cadillac alone."

"Prohibition in Wexford county is an absolute farce."

"Statistics gathered by the police department prove that more young men have been arrested in Cadillac since county prohibition went into effect than at any time in the previous history of the city."

"I have seen more young men under the influence of whiskey since county prohibition went into effect than ever before."

"Many public improvements that were planned before the prohibition law went into effect have now become impossible, owing to the loss of revenue from the liquor licenses. A number of manufacturers who contemplated moving to Cadillac have changed their minds."

"There is more drinking here among men than ever before. Cadillac simply cannot stand the county prohibition law. At the present time the city is overrun with whiskey as a result of the crusade started by the Anti-Saloonists."

These statements are not true. Not one them. There has been less drunkenness in Cadillac since the local option law went into effect than ever before.

Not one-fourth as many arrests have been made since the law went into effect here as during the same months before the law became effective.

Only the persons whom the saloons employed have left Cadillac because of the local option law. There are not more vacant houses than there were one year ago.

Not a single public improvement has been abandoned by reason of the loss of the liquor licenses.

At the present time there are fewer liquor sales made in Cadillac than ever before—fewer perhaps than in any other city of its size in the entire United States.

These statements are not made anonymously or posted secretly. They will be read in fifteen hundred Cadillac homes tonight.

And we challenge any man, woman or child in Cadillac to prove a single statement here made untrue or overdrawn.

John Doe, who calls himself for the time being "Brown" the Detroit newspaper man, who was here in the interests of the State Brewers' association several days ago, and faked a lot of interviews with prominent business and professional men in a statement against local option, was in the city Monday wearing "sack cloth and ashes." He humbly went the rounds of the ten men and begged their pardon declaring that although he had made some mistakes his employers had themselves changed his copy. Ten righteously hot citizens called him down hard and he has left for some of them letters exonerating them in full from the statements he claimed they had made.

The anti-local option circulars were given good circulation in several counties, but fortunately for that cause it was done early in the campaign and not late.

Brown was in the city Tuesday and has been telling that he is heartily sick of the part he has been playing in the light against local option, but that he did it because he needed the money and that this is his last week. Judging from the assidnity with which he continues to ply his nefarious business here in Cadillac, Brown does not mean what he says as he is still getting statements from Cadillac men. That the statements being made to him will be much at variance with what will eventually appear in print goes without saying. Brown's story will again be that his employers, changed his copy. He admits now that he is not representing a syndicate of Ohio papers, as was his first claim but he now truthfully says he is working for the state brewers' association and it is in the interest of that organization that signatures are being secured here.—Cadillac News & Express.

TAXES PAID BY FARMERS

Farmers!

The prohibitionists will tell you that the destruction of your market for farm products amounting to something upwards of one hundred and ten million dollars is only a trifling sum as compared with your total output, or one bushel in forty-four.

They will tell you also that your share of the taxes paid by the liquor interests, amounting to one hundred and fifty eight million, eight hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, will also be small.

The cost of the Revolutionary War lasting five years was one hundred and thirty-five million dollars. It bankrupted the country for twenty years. Are you willing to sacrifice in a single year an amount which is greater than the cost of that war? Can you afford to pay this amount for the so-called reform of the morals of the people in the large cities of the country.

George Washington always insisted that the farmers and common people saved the country in 1776. That being true it is no reason why they should be compelled to pay additional taxes at this time for the purpose of fanatical experiments.

Do you want to make up out of your own pockets the annual state and government tax of $272,000,000 paid by the brewing and kindred interests?

That's What Prohibition Means

Study these figures. They mean a great deal to you. They are based on the United States census report for 1905. If the figures for 1907 could be given with equal authority they would be much larger. However, these figures, two years old, are government statements and are large enough to make you think.

Jerry Utley, who had been arrested by the Wisconsin authorities on complaint of Jasper Dunbar, charged with selling him mortgaged property. Utley paid all expenses of the sheriff, paid Dunbar and another claim that was against him and the warrant was withdrawn. The settlement of this case in this way is a good thing for the county, as the expenses for extradition papers, the sheriff's expenses and court costs would have amounted to about $200 on the county. Utley is in the cement business in the famous city.

Gunners' Patron Saint.

Why was St. Barbara chosen to be the patron saint of all gunners? It is one of those things which are to be known and which one ought to know, but does not. Meanwhile there is the fact that she does intercede for all gunners by land or sea.

In the old French navy the Ste. Barbe was the gun room, and the name may be found with that meaning attached to it in all dictionaries. Moreover, in France she is the saint not only of gunners, but of all fire brigades. The sapeurs pompiers, who for some mysterious reason are a regular chopping block for jokes, hold their holiday on the day of her feast.—Westminster Gazette.

Mrs. Wealthia Trombley of Antrim, has been arrested on complaint of her husband and taken to Bellaire, where she will be resentenced. Some time ago the woman left home with an "affinity" and the couple were later caught and brought back there, the man being sentenced to 90 days in the Detroit house of correction and Mrs. Trombley released on suspended sentence. Her release was conditional on her returning to live with her husband, but after a short time she again left and Trombley secured the warrant.

A deal in Chicago real estate whereby the heirs of Perry Hannah, a pioneer of Traverse City, will receive more than $4,000,000, was announced last week.

The deal consisted of the lease of the northeast corner of State street and Jackson boulevard, a lot 80 feet 6 inches by 144 feet, to H. C. Lytton by the Hannah heirs and Eugene S. Kimball, the lease being 103 years.

The land was purchased by Perry Hannah a number of years ago for for $200,000 and his annual net income from the building rental was $12,000. On this property he gave a lease to Eugene S. Kimball and see before Hannah died, Kimball endeavored to have the lease renewed but Hannah refused, the Kimball lease having four years yet to run, which makes the Lytton lease run beyond the usual ninety-nine year period.

The rental is $88,000 annually for the first ten years, $00,000 annually for the next thirty-nine years and $01,000 for the remainder of the term. Lytton will erect an office building to cost $1,000,000.

Alfalfa will grow in Northern Michigan and will become one of the profitable crops of this section of the state, it being possible to harvest two and even three crops in a season. This is based on the experience of Samuel Willis, who is the owner of the Owosso Fuel Co., and uses a large number of horses. He has been experimenting to see from what he could get the best results on land in Benzie. He sowed alfalfa, using oats as a cover crop. The yield was abundant, very abundant, three crops being secured; the secret of alfalfa growing being frequent mowing before the plant has blossomed fully. There is an advantage about growing alfalfa in that if the crop dosen't catch it can be sown again and two crops harvested the same year. It is valuable as a stock food as he found that by feeding two quarts of oats a day and using alfalfa instead of hay, his horses were in better condition than if he had used four quarts of oats and the best timothy hay.

MISERY IN STOMACH

And Indigestion Vanishes Five Minutes Later

Eat your Favorite Foods Without Fear of Dyspepsia or an Upset Stomach Resulting

Why not start now, today, and forever rid yourself of stomach trouble and indigestion? A dieted stomach gets the blues and grumbles. Give it a good eat, then take Pape's Diapepsia to start the digestive juices working. There will be no dyspepsia or belching of gas or eructations of undigested food; no feeling like a lump of lead in the stomach or heartburn, sick headache and dizziness, and your food will not ferment and poison your breath with nauseous odors.

Pape's Diapepsia costs only 50 cents for a large case at any drug store here, and will relieve the most obstinate case of indigestion and upset stomach in five minutes.

There is nothing else better to take gas from stomach and cleanse the stomach and intestines, and besides, one triangule will digest and prepare for assimilation into the blood of your food the same as a sound, healthy stomach would do it.

When Diapepsia works, your stomach rests—gets itself in order, cleans up and then you feel like eating when you come to the table and what you eat will do you good.

Absolute relief from all stomach misery is waiting for you as soon as you decide to begin taking Diapepsia. Tell your druggist that you want Pape's Diapepsia, because you want to be thoroughly cured of indigestion.

How to Remove Match Marks.

To remove the marks left on the woodwork from striking matches take an orange or a lemon cut in half and rub the marks quite hard for a minute. Then wipe off with a clean rag which has been moistened in water and then dipped in whiting. Rub well with this rag and then dry thoroughly. In almost every case the disfiguring marks will be removed by this treatment.

How to Save Shoe Soles.

Warm the soles and apply a heavy coat of warm tar. Dry it in and apply two more coats before wearing them. Smear the edges as long as they will absorb the tar. They will wear like horn, and once giving it a trial will convince the most skeptical of its value. The tar costs but a few cents at gas works. Warm it on the stove in a tin dish.

How to Wash Chamois Gloves.

Put the gloves on your hands and then proceed as though washing your hands in lukewarm water—lather the hands (rather gloves) thoroughly with soap, then rinse—then mop with a towel. Let the gloves stay on the hands until they start to dry; then hang up, but not near the heat, rather by a window

Blanket For Horse's Comfort.

The horse blanket should always be ready to use after a hard drive, for a horse will chill very quickly if left standing in a cold wind. Forgetting to take the blanket along has caused many a horse to develop lung trouble that no veterinarian has been able to cure.

"You are very much in love with him, dear, aren't you?" Mrs. Brevort inquired, not without a certain doubtful note in her tone, which seemed to hint that such possibly might not be the case.

The girl who stood by the window, looking out at the uneven pavements of the Roman street, turned slowly and smiled. In that smile were weariness and subtle understanding and patient resignation.

"Yes, I am very much in love with him, Aunt Elinor," she said in a colorless voice, as if she were saying the words more because they were expected of her than for any other reason.

Mrs. Brevort smiled her open approval. The little frown of doubt which for the past few moments had wrinkled her brow suddenly disappeared. She crossed the room to the girl's side and threw an arm about her.

"Of course, dearie," she cooed, "your happiness is my first, I might almost say my only, concern. No one realizes better than I the portent of this step—that all your future, all your lifelong happiness depends upon it. No one, I think you'll admit, too, is more averse to the majority of these marriages than I am, but the duke is so utterly different from all the other eligible men we have met. He is not seeking your money, dear, for he is immensely wealthy in his own right. He is an upright, honest, splendid type of manhood like our own men in America, I think, than any one we have seen. Isn't that your impression of him?"

"Yes," said the girl in the same colorless voice.

Mrs. Brevort's pale face grew rather eager. "Somehow I have felt from the first that your destinies were linked yours and his," said she, "but when he talked with me this afternoon I gave him no definite answer. I let him understand that the matter rested primarily with you; that it was your happiness that was at stake.

"He didn't seem quite to understand my attitude at first, but he was perfectly charming about it, as he is in everything. He said I was to speak to you and that he would call for me this afternoon at 4 in the road car, and while we went out to the aqueduct I could give him my final decision, or, rather, yours."

The girl had turned again to the window. She was looking abstractedly at the passing crowd in the street below. Her brow was furrowed by a little disfiguring frown. Her lips were set tightly together. Her eyes were troubled.

"So I suppose I am to give him a favorable answer, am I not?" Mrs. Brevort suggested tentatively.

The girl was silent. The troubled look in her eyes grew more pronounced. Her aunt watched her narrowly and with growing impatience.

"Peggy, dear, I asked you a question," she reminded her niece. "Is it a favorable answer I am to give?"

The girl shrugged her dainty shoulders. "Yes, yes; oh, yes!" she said hurriedly. "It doesn't matter." Her voice suddenly choked. "Nothing matters!"

Mrs. Brevort elevated her brows. "Really, Peggy"—she began childingly. But the girl turned swiftly and left the room, waving back the older woman, who started to follow her. Something like a smothered sob sounded as the door closed behind her.

Mrs. Brevort looked rather angry for a moment. Then she recovered her usual composure and smiled. But there was something distinctly unpleasant in that smile.

She glanced at the bronze clock ticking unobtrusively on the mantel. It pointed to half after 3. She went to a desk near the front window and from a drawer drew out a bundle of letters. They were all directed in the same hand—Peggy's hand. And they were all addressed to Mr. William Hale, at some outlandish Spanish sounding town in Ecuador, South America.

Mrs. Brevort smiled again. It had cost her a pretty penny to circumvent the mailing of those letters, but there are many itching palms in Rome, and what good money will not accomplish, if it is judiciously placed, is not worth accomplishing.

An open fire burned daily in the grate beneath the mantel. Mrs. Brevort stepped briskly over to it and fed the bundle of letters to the flames. She watched grimly until there was nothing left of them save a few gray white ashes.

Then from another drawer she took out another bundle of letters. They were thick letters, all of them. The sprawling superscriptions were all for Peggy, and they were postmarked with the name of the Spanish town in Ecuador.

Other itching Roman palms had been soothed in the conventional way to bring those epistles into Mrs. Brevort's possession.

These, too, she consigned to the grate, watched them burn and then arrayed herself for her appointment with the duke.

At precisely 4 she came in the road car. She descended the stairs, greeted him effusively, and together they whirled off toward the aqueduct.

Scarcely had Mrs. Brevort taken her departure when there came to the hotel a brisk, broad shouldered young man. Unmistakably he was American, and unmistakably he had been enduring recently all the discomforts of continental travel when such travel necessitates haste.

He glanced at the register, saw therein a certain name, heaved a mighty sigh of relief, but even as he searched his pockets for his cardcase the owner of the name that had caused his recent eight days' tripping down the stairs strayed for a walk through the autumn streets, and, turning around, the young man stood staring open mouthed at Peggy in all her glory.

The girl's eyes, too, lighted suddenly. She gave a little gasp of surprise. In an instant the young man was beside her, and both her hands were in his own.

"Peggy, Peggy!" he was saying breathlessly.

"Billy," she was saying in a low, shaken voice, "where on earth did you come from?"

In a masterful manner he led her to the street, once outside they both began talking as fast as they could.

"Not a word from you all this time," he declared, "not one single, solitary word. I couldn't stand it any longer. I left the bridge building down there and my chances for eternal fame and fortune with it, all in the hands of Johnson, and came over here to learn the worst. I even had to cable north to Daniels to find out where you were."

"Billy, what do you mean?" she asked in unbelief. "I have written a note written and never had one single answer from you."

"Eh? What's this?" said he. "I've written every day of my life. You haven't got them?" His eyes grew suddenly dark. "Where's that precious aunt of yours?"

And suddenly Peggy remembered in the midst of her new found happiness just where her aunt was.

"Oh, heavens, Billy!" she said. "Why didn't you come before?"

"Why?"

"Why?" she repeated. "Why, indeed! Aunt Elinor is on motoring this afternoon with the Duke of Solena. She has gone with him to tell him I'll marry him. I thought—I thought when you were silent—when I didn't hear from you"—

Its teeth came together with a click. He faced her there in the Roman street, with the Roman sunshine flooding it with mellow warmth.

"To tell him you'll marry him!" he repeated. "Peggy, you're not going to, are you?"

She looked at him archly. "It's the only offer I've had recently," she said in mocking happiness.

"You'll have another right away," said he, with determination, "one that I dare you to turn down," he added, with a boyish laugh.

"But the duke," she said breathlessly. "I'm probably engaged to him by this time. Aunt Elinor wastes no time."

"I'll attend to the duke and your aunt, too," said he grimly. "What time will they return?"

"Almost any minute now," said she. "Come, let's go back. We mustn't miss them, must we, Billy?"

A Grateful Boy.

A gift always opens the door of an Eskimo heart, declares Knud Rasmussen in "The People of the Polar North," and then tells the story of a little orphan boy whom he ran across in his travels.

I had a little pocketknife in my pocket, and I presented it to him in order to establish our acquaintance.

It was assuredly the first time in his life that the boy had ever had such an experience as to receive a present. I assured him that I really meant it. Then, without a change of expression, he snatched the knife out of my hand and ran off. I did not think that I should see any more of him and was just going into our tent when he came running up with a piece of walrus meat, which he pressed into my hand.

"Then gavest, see; I give, too," said he, and his face shone with grease and pride. But from that day forth we were friends.

Kajoranguaq had no relatives at all to look after him. He was everybody's drudge and slept in an old ruined building, where he said he was very comfortable. He could not have been more than ten years old at the outside, although there was little of the child about him, but after he came to live in our tent we noticed that he began to sing when alone, and after awhile he would beat time to his singing on a little tin box, so in spite of a life of neglect he got a little joy now and then.

An Essay on Man.

Man that is born of woman is small potatoes and few in a hill. He rises up today and flourishes like a ragweed, and tomorrow or next day the undertaker hath him. He goeth forth in the morning warbling like a lark and is knocked out in one round and two seconds. In the midst of life he is in debt, and the tax collector pursues him wherever he goeth. The banister of life is full of splinters, and he sliteth down with considerable rapidity. He roameth home at eventide and meeteth the wheelbarrow in his path. It riseth up and smiteth him to the earth and falleth upon him and runneth one of its legs into his ear. In the gentle springtime he putteth on his summer clothes, and a blizzard striketh him far from home and filleth him with cuss words and rheumatism. He buyeth a warbling, and when he cometh home from the club the watchdog treeth him and sitteth near him until rosy morn. He goeth to the race course and betteth his money on the brown mare, and the hay gelding with a blaze face winneth. He marrieth a red headed heiress with a wart on her nose, and the next day the parent ancestor goeth under with a crash and great liabilities and comeif home to live with his beloved son-in-law.

For a tight, hoarse cough where phlegm is not raised or with difficulty take hot water often, as hot as can be sipped. This will be found to give immediate and permanent relief.

A Homemade Barrel Header.

A simple and handy device for the farm is that shown in the accompanying cut. It is of special value where the article contained in the barrel should be safely secured either in shipping or in storage. Its utility in other respects will be recognized at a glance. The barrel header is so simple in its construction that any directions as to how to make it would be superfluous.

Rheumatism in Cows.

Cows are subject to rheumatism, says a writer, and it affects them in the legs between the knee and the hip. The following treatment is recommended by the writer: First of all provide a comfortable, warm, dry, well ventilated stable and well lighted, but protected from strong drafts. There should be an abundance of clean, dry bedding. The food should be soft, easily digestible, slightly laxative, and the water clean, pure and cool. Give half an ounce of saltpeter three times a day. At the onset of the treatment give one pound of epsom salts in half a gallon of water and occasional smaller doses afterward to keep the bowels open. If you can bvate the pain rub daily with camphorated spirits.

Serious Interruptions.

The truly lazy man is not a common figure in this country, and when he does appear he is not treated with proper respect. Ideal laziness is an art as difficult as playing on the violin. A writer in the Washington Star tells of one member of the Sons of Rest who deserves recognition.

"I s'pose John is still taking life easy?" said the woman in the spring wagon.

"Yes," answered the woman who was carrying an armful of wood. "John has only two regrets in life. One is that he has to wake up to eat, and the other is that he has to quit eating to sleep."—Youth's Companion.

Ethelberta is a doctor's daughter just past six, which throws a side light on the story the Philadelphia Ledger tells about her. On her sixth birthday Ethelberta's father gave her a little ring with a tiny pearl in it. Not very long after that she appeared in her father's office looking very woebegone.

"Oh, daddy," she said, "I've lost the little pill out of my ring!"

was the real Hugh's wife by law and right. He himself could not marry her. If God would but turn back the universe and give him yesterday!

His feet dragging as though from cold, he climbed the mountain road. As he walked he took from his pocket the little gold cross, and his fingers, numb with misery, tied it to his thong watch guard. It had been only a bauble, a pocket-piece acquired he knew not when or how. Now he knew it for the badge of his calling. He remembered now that, pressed in certain way, it would open, and engraved inside were his name and the date of his ordination.

He might shut the cabin door, but he could not forbid the torturer that came with him across the threshold. He might throw himself upon his knees and bury his face in the rough skin of the couch, but he could not shut out words that blent in golden lettered flashes across his throbbing eyeballs. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife."

So he crouched, a man under whose feet life had crashed, leaving him pinned beneath the wreck to watch the fire that must creep nearer and nearer.

* * * * * * *

Curiosity held Jessica until the evangelist closed his melodeon preparatory to a descent upon the dance hall. Then, thinking of the growing dark with some trepidation, she started toward the mountain.

Ahead of her a muffled puff-puff sounded, and the dark bulk of an automobile was moving slowly in the same direction, and she quickened her pace, glad of this quasi company.

A little way up the ascent a cumbrous shadow startled her. She saw in a moment that it was the automobile, halted at the side of the road. Her footsteps made no sound, and she was close upon it when she saw the three men it had carried standing near by. She made to pass them and had crossed half the intervening space, when some instinct sent her to the shade of the trees. They had stopped opposite the hydraulic concession, where a side path left the main road. It was the same path by which she and August Prendergast had taken their unconscious burden on a night long ago, leading along the hillside, overlooking the snakelike flume and forming a steeper short cut to the cabin above. They were conversing in low tones, and as they talked they palated, she thought, toward it.

Jessica had never in her life been an eavesdropper, but her excited senses made her anxious. Moreover, she was in a way committed, for she could not now emerge without being seen. As she waited a man came from the path and joined the others. The sky had been overcast and gloomy, but the moon drew out just then, and she saw that the newcomer, evidently a patrol, carried a rifle in the hollow of his arm. She also saw that one of the first three was the automobile's owner.

"It was Stives killed him."

For some minutes they conversed in undertones, whose very secrecy inflamed her imagination. It seemed to her that they made some reference to the flume. Had there been another robbery of the sluice boxes and could they still suspect Hugh?

Dread and indignation made her bold. When they turned into the path she followed, treading noiselessly, till she was close behind them. They had stopped again and were looking intently at a shadowy gray something that moved in the bottom below.

She heard the man who carried the rifle say, with a smothered laugh:

"It's only Barney McGinn's old white horse taking a drink out of the sluice box. He often does that."

Then the sheriff's voice said: "McGinn's horse is in town tonight, with Barney on her back. Horse or no horse, I'm going to"— The rest was lost in the swift action with which he snatched the firearm from the first speaker, sighted and fired.

In the still night the concussion seemed to rock the ground and roused a hundred echoes. It startled and shocked the listening girl, but not so much as the sound that followed it—a cry that had nothing animal-like and that sent the men running down the slope toward an object that lay huddled by the sluice box.

In morbid curiosity Jessica followed, slipping from shadow to shadow. She saw the sheriff kneel down and draw a collapsed and empty horse-skin from a figure whose thieving cunning it would never cloak again.

"So it was you, after all, Prendergast!" the sheriff said contemptuously.

The white face stared up at them, venomous and writhing, turning about the circle as though searching for some one who was not there.

"How did—you guess?"

The sheriff, who had been making a swift examination, answered the panted question. "You have no time to think of that now," he said.

A sinister look darted into the filming yellow eyes, and hatred and cunning rekindled them. Prendergast struggled to a sitting posture, then fell back, convulsed. "Hugh Stives! He was the only—one who knew—how it was done. He's clever, but he can't get the best of Prendergast!" A spasm distorted his features. "Wait—wait!"

He fumbled in his breast, and his fingers brought forth a crumpled piece of paper. He thrust it into the sheriff's hands.

"Look! Look!" he gasped. "The man they found murdered on the claim there"—he pointed wildly up the hillside—"Dr. Moreau. I found him—dying! Stives"—

Strength was fast failing him. He tried again to speak, but only inarticulate sounds came from his throat.

A blind terror had clutched the heart of the girl leaning from the shadow. "Dr. Moreau"—"murdered." Why, he had been one of Hugh's friends! Why did this man couple Hugh's name with that worst of crimes? What dreadful thing was he trying to tell? She hardly repressed a desire to scream aloud.

"Be careful what you say, Prendergast," said the sheriff sternly.

The wretched man gathered force for a last effort? His voice came in a croaking whisper:

"It was Stives killed him. Moreau wrote it down—and I—kept the paper. Tell Hugh—we break—even!"

HEALTH AND BEAUTY.

In massaging wrinkles use the tips of the fingers and thumb, always working across the line. Never follow the lines of the creases.

For the baggy appearance under the eyes rub gently with the tips of the fingers dipped in alcohol. Afterward massage in the same way with cold cream.

A pallid skin indicates an anaemic condition of the blood, the lack of the red corpuscles. A good iron tonic is a necessity to improve such a complexion.

When shampooing never rub the soap directly on the hair, as it gums and is almost impossible to rub or rinse off. Always have the soap in some liquid form.

For falling hair try massaging the scalp nightly with a lotion made of three drams of pure glycerin, four ounces of limewater and half an ounce of tincture of cantharides.

Bushy, irregular eyebrows should be brushed lightly with a camel's hair brush dipped in olive oil. The same treatment is good for stiff and harsh eyebrows and is said to make them grow.

Pork should not be attempted as a food except with those who have constitutions and stomachs of iron, and then it should be thoroughly cooked. Children should never be allowed to touch it or veal.

A lotion recommended to whiten a red nose is made of seven and a half grains of tannic acid and two and a half ounces of camphor water. After the acid is dissolved the nose is moistened several times a day and at night, the liquid drying on.

Our History One of Plunder.

We have been exploiting a continent, the broadest and richest ever allotted to any people. A horde of plunderers, we have swept down upon its treasures, consuming ruthlessly its forests, impoverishing its soil, strewing its meadows to the seas and burning its treasured mountains as our barbarian forefathers burned the hills of Rome. As robbers we have succeeded tremendously. That has been hitherto our success. We have had but one American. The great Americans have been Edison, Morse, Fulton and their like, together with the masters of business who have heaped up the largest fortunes the world has ever known. Were all America to be blotted out, past and present, the loss to the world of culture, thought and beauty would not equal the loss of one small year of Athens. The time is surely coming when we can live no more by plunder, but must set ourselves to build and to plant and to renew our life from within. The day of our reckoning will also surely come. We cannot much longer grow rich by devastation nor even live by it. America's wealth must come from her men.—President Thomas of Middlebury College in Leslie's Weekly.

Coffee and Sedition.

The coffee houses of our ancestors were as fiercely attacked as are the public houses of modern England. For many years the Tories clamored for their suppression, and Lord Guilford, the lord chancellor, declared that they were "nurseries of idleness and pragmaticalness and hinder the consumption of our native provisions. They may be treated as common nuisances." It was suggested that they should be closed on account of their alleged seditious tendencies, but that some compensation should be given to the proprietors. Charles II. was at first inclined to favor this proposal, but when it was pointed out to him that coffee was an important source of national revenue he declined to interfere, and a proclamation against coffee houses issued by the Tory government a few days later proved entirely ineffective. —Dundee Advertiser.

FLOWER CUPS FOR ICES.

Charming Table Decorations For Bridge and Puzzle Parties.

With bridge and puzzle parties in full swing the hostess finds herself again confronted with the problem of offering attractive favors and decorations for her luncheon, dinner or tea guests. Fancy paper ornaments are always a satisfactory investment for the reason that they are effective, inexpensive and generally novel in shape or idea.

American Beauty rose cups are truly charming. One style is made with the large curling petals resting on the table, and in the heart of each gloriously tinted flower is placed a small ice cup made of finely plaited paper held together at the rim by a band of "Beauty" crape paper twisted into a cord and tied at one side. The petals of the rose curl up around the cup so that very little of it shows. It is not essential to have leaves and stems with this kind of cup. Another style is more true to nature, however, and it represents a half blown La France rose standing three or four inches above the table. The flower is mounted on a green stem which is twisted spirally so that the blossom sways as though touched by summer zephyrs. Branching from the thick thorn decorated stem are realistic looking rose leaves fashioned of green crape paper; then the base of the stem is curled around a green paper covered disk.

For a more elaborate ornament one might have a cluster of cups instead of serving individual ones. A spray of blossoms with leaves looked charming in the center of a luncheon table whose decorations were pink. The flowers were La France roses, six large beauties nestling in foliage. Each rose heart was an ice cup, and the spray was laid on a mirror which was surrounded by more rose foliage.

Golden hearted flowers holding small receptacles for orange ice or an ice cream tinted to match the flower petals make a novel and pleasing decoration. These come in a variety of colors and shades.

THE UNPOPULAR MOTHER.

Bad Policy to Trumpet Her Own Children as Prodigies.

She who takes sides in children's fights. The mother hen may fight for her brood, but if the human mother tries it even her youngsters are not grateful for the interference.

She who thinks her own lambs can do no wrong, while her neighbor's lambs are sheep of inky dye.

The mother who trumpets her children as prodigies. They may be wonders, but perfection palls when always in evidence. Besides, what a store of trouble for the children to live up to their mother's boasting!

She who thinks it clever for her little ones to be brutally frank and cannot distinguish between rudeness and witticism.

The mother who is such a poor disciplinarian that her sole conversation is, "Johnny, don't do that!" "Mamie, didn't I tell you to behave?" It pays to make children obey, both for their own popularity and that of the mother.

She who enjoys herself at the expense of the neighborhood. Some mothers play bridge all day, while their children run wild, nor are the Mrs. Jellybys extinct.

The mother who is sure you are dying to hear Arabelle's latest effort on the piano or Willie's newest recitation. The sufferer hates the mother for the forced lies as much as for inflicted eardrums.

She who thinks dirt is healthy and does not bother much what sticky fingers touch. Mothers of fingerers generally come under the social ban.

The doting mother, who not only flatters her own offspring, but expects all her friends to back her up in admiration.

She who thinks manners are inborn and doesn't trouble to cultivate them in her children.

NOTE ETIQUETTE.

Nothing More Indicative of Breeding and Education Than the Signature.

It is useless to know what to write in a note if one does not understand the manner of doing it.

For example, no other small detail is more indicative of breeding and education than the signature. Under no circumstances should the prefix Mr., Mrs. or Miss be used unless it go in parentheses. Even then it is only to indicate whether it is a man or woman and, if the latter, married or unmarried, which makes it permissible. In writing to total strangers or to those who have not this information it may appear. In writing to a social inferior the prefix is always possible, but even then it must be parenthesized.

If a married woman is writing to a social equal who does not know the status of her correspondent the writer should sign her own name in full, as "Mary Jane Smith," and underneath write her formal name, "Mrs. John James Smith," putting parentheses about the lower signature. To a social equal upon whom for some reason she has not called, but would wish to, a married woman signs her own name and incloses her visiting card.

It is desirable that all letter and note paper shall be stamped either with monogram and address or both. According to the newest way of placing it, if only the monogram is used it is in the upper left hand corner. A note should begin always with "My dear," not "Dear" without the "my." If the writing must continue beyond the first page it is the fourth that should next be used. If more space is needed, then the paper should be turned so the right edge becomes the top and the second page becomes the third.

To end a note the formal way is "Cordially" unless the person to whom one is writing is addressed as "Dear Sir" and then "Sincerely" is employed.

For all invitations "cordially" is to be preferred. For letters to old friends the words "Faithfully" and "As always" are most commonly used. "Sincerely also being good form. "Affectionately" and "Lovingly" are for old friends or relatives. Envelopes should be addressed with the utmost precision. It is permissible to put the word "To" or "For" before the name, but it is a continental rather than an American custom. It is always better form to write the full name, as "Miss Mary Jane Smith" or "Mrs. John James Brown," rather than to substitute initials.

If a note or letter is to be delivered in the city in which it is mailed, "Town" is now used in preference to the city's name. This is not a fad that commended itself to the postoffice, but it is sanctioned by society.

The postage stamp must always be exactly in the upper right hand corner, for to put it at an angle or on any other spot is considered ignorant or vulgar.

"Dat mule," said the colored citizen, "hez sho' got religion in 'im."

"Think so?"

"I know so. Ter my sartin knowledge he hez kicked six sinners cl'ar ter glory."

"But—you reckon dey got in?"

"Dey had ter. Dey broke in. W'en dat mule hits you wid his heels you'd make daylight thoo a stone wall!"—

Five Hundred Charlevoix County Patrons Will go to Traverse City in 1909

1. Why is the anti-saloon movement so progressive?

Because the saloon conditions in America and in our own state have been growing worse while the public conscience has been growing better.

2. Where is the anti-saloon movement in progress?

In practically every state of the Union. Beginning in the south it has spread rapidly through the west and north and is moving toward the east. Our own state movement began last year with victories in ten counties, and we anticipate a battle in twenty-six counties this year.

3. How is the progress of the movement made possible?

Largely through the fact that all the forces for temperance have been allied and co-ordinated under the management of the Anti-Saloon League, and the rapidly developing sentiment has been crystallized into action.

1. What has been its effect on business?

It is the generally acknowledged fact on the part of all business interests that the business interests are among the first to show the advantage of a saloonless town.

2. What is the general effect upon morals?

It has at least a dual effect. It relieves society for the moral responsibility of sharing in the spoils of a degrading business. It gives every man who wills it a chance to be free from an open and enticing temptation.

3. What is its effect upon politics?

The saloon has been a notorious partner of bad politics. It has shared the spoils of every bad origin in city and in country. It has debauched legislatures, and has put at defiance all laws which do not agree with its plans and purposes. With the saloon out of politics it is easier to elect good men who will represent the real interests of a large constituency and not the limited interests of any special business.

4. What is the general effect on the homelife?

There is no question but that the saloon is the master enemy of the home. It affects both its material prosperity and its moral integrity. Wherever the saloon has been banished, the homes of poverty and of want have been the first to respond to the new conditions. Instances too numerous to mention in every community present reason for the abolition of the saloons—State Bulletin.

FOR THE BOLTERS.

Feed Boxes to Prevent Horses From Eating Too Rapidly.

Many horses bolt their feed, and the result is indigestion and other ills. One horseman who has animals that eat too fast has built an arrangement for the manger to overcome this, and he describes is as follows:

"To prevent a team from eating oats too fast use a box as shown in the illustration. A partition goes from top to bottom, so each horse can be fed different amounts. The . is covered with hinged lid and placed in the middle of the manger if used for two horses. If only one horse needs it make half a box and put at one end of the manger. Put feed in hopper, and it works slowly into feed box below."

FOR FAST EATERS.

Another horseman has an automatic feed box for the fast eaters in his stable. He says of the arrangement:

AUTOMATIC HORSE FEEDER.

"When horses bolt their feed the habit leads to indigestion and other troubles. A feed box placed on the floor having a covered compartment for feed in one end, with a slanting partition that lets it out as the horse eats it, is a splendid contrivance. Horses naturally feed from the ground. An elevated manger is a mistake. A loose box like this on the floor of a box stall is an ideal way of feeding grain to a horse."

MOLASSES FOR COWS.

Aids Digestion and Improves Quality of Milk, Says Hoard.

At the recent national dairy show W. D. Hoard, the well known authority on dairy subjects, advised farmers to feed molasses to their cows.

"Cows like sweets," he said. "I feed my herd a regular ration of molasses every day, and I find that it thrives on it. It makes their flesh fat and their skins glossy. It gives zest to their appetite and helps their digestion. It increases the quantity and improves the quality of their milk, for it puts the cow in a good humor, and a good humored cow is the best milker.

"Of course the thing can be overdone. Too much molasses is bad for the cow, just the same as too many chocolates are bad for Daughter Susan or too much taffy disagrees with young Bill. But a steady diet of a small quantity of molasses is a great thing for a dairy herd. My cows have got into the habit of looking for it. They don't relish their fodder without it. I feed it to them all the year around, except in the breeding season. The carbons in it are dangerous then.

"I have had occasion," continued Mr. Hoard, "to go rather deeply into the subject of the relation between the nerves of taste and the nerves of digestion. As a general thing it is true of human beings that the things they like are the things that are good for them. The same thing is true of animals. The most profitable feed for the farmer in a general way is the feed his stock likes."

Treatment of Live Stock.

Horses and, in fact, all domestic animals are very much more impressionable than they are generally supposed to be. Cattle which have had a kind master, a man of gentle but firm nature, show the effect of their association as a breed or strain. Years of good treatment not only make an impression on the individuals, but are impressed with such force as to become a breed characteristic. In short, a keen judge can tell pretty nearly what sort of associations a horse has had by his temperament.

The importance of creating a good temperament in a trotting or pacing horse should not be underrated. The horse with a good temperament will do more work and do it better than one which has not got a well balanced temperament.

Farm and Garden

GATE FOR THE SNOWDRIFT.

Simple Plan For Open Way In and Out.

There is no snow cleaning in the country. The farmer breaks his way through the drifts with difficulty. There is more play for the wind in the country than there is in the city, and when the snow-mountains be wind the drifts impede travel and clog the ways about the farm. The gateway must be kept clear because that is the way in as well as the way out. Unless the gate is constructed in a manner that will readily yield to the impediments it is about as good as no gate. In the plan suggested herewith is a partial solution of the difficulty which so often confronts the farmer at this season of the year. Two cuts are pictured. They show a gate which can be readily adjusted in case of snowdrifts.

It is easily made from ordinary lumber. A 1 by 6 upright is used for the two lower boards, 1 by 4 for the upper ones. The uprights at the hinge post are double 1 by 4, one piece on side and the other inside the bars. The upright at the latch side may be the same weight of stuff or slightly lighter and fastened in the same way. Instead of nailing the bars to these uprights, bolts are used, one for each bar at each end. The lowest board is notched, as shown, and the double brace used from the top of the latch post to the bottom of the hinge post. For the braces 1 by 3 stuff is strong enough. These may be held in place at the top by a single bolt. They are joined near the bottom with a bolt which engages with the notches when the gate is raised, as shown in the cut.

Tuberculosis In Animals.

The international congress on tuberculosis which recently met in Washington, as a whole, dealt especially with human tuberculosis, but considerable attention was directed to tuberculosis in domestic animals and notably to questions dealing with the milk and meat supply and with the inspection of these products. One of the seven sections into which the congress was divided devoted itself especially to these topics, and the general addresses before the congress, as a whole, included a lecture by Professor Bernard Bang of Copenhagen on "Studies in Tuberculosis in Domestic Animals and What We May Learn Regarding Human Tuberculosis." An extended discussion followed the reaffirmation by Professor Dr. Robert Koch of Berlin of his theory as to the nonidentity and nontransmissibility of human and bovine tuberculosis, after, which a resolution was unanimously adopted recommending "that preventive measures be continued against bovine tuberculosis and that the possibility of the propagation of this to man be recognized."

The very extensive exhibits from the various countries in America and Europe attracted much attention and presented a vast amount of illustrative material of pure educational value. Phases dealing especially with the prevention and treatment of the disease in its early stages predominated, there being a great variety of models of sanitoria and special appliances.

THE HO...

Animal's Weakest Part Too Often Neglected, Says a Veterinarian.

By G. H. GLOVER, D. V. M.

In considering the diseases to which horseflesh is heir there are two things that should always be considered as of special importance the teeth and the feet. The average period of usefulness of the horse is curtailed several years by the inadequacy of the teeth. In most horses at the age of fifteen the teeth have become rough and uneven, and from that time on the horse is a hard keeper, and the real cause is not known by the owner; to buying horses the teeth and the feet should receive most careful examination.

Ordinarily, in speaking of the feet of the horse, we mean the part inclosed by the hoof wall. Looking at it from a standpoint of comparative anatomy, the foot includes all below the knee and the hock. The artificial conditions under which the horse is placed and the unusual demand exacted of him result in almost every case in diseased conditions which render him incapable of doing the work he would otherwise do. Shoeing, which places him under artificial conditions, combined with the hard roads, overwork and improper feeding, soon produces inflammatory conditions which may result in side bones, ringbones, coffin joint lameness, cracks in the hoof wall, contracted heels, corns and a great many more diseases too numerous to mention.

In many cases the horse must be shod, but there certainly is far too much shoeing done. It is surprising how much work the horse can do under most conditions without shoes if he be brought gradually to the work and a little care and judgment be exercised in this matter during the first three or four years of the colt's life. There are three things especially to be remembered if you wish to give this subject a little extra thought—first, as long as you use horses that have weak or defective feet for breeding purposes just so long will you have horses with a predisposition to these things, and you will lose money on them accordingly; second, do less shoeing. A horse with fairly good feet will not need to be shod unless he be worked on the pavement, race track or in mountainous districts; third, do not allow any horseshoer to use the buttress on the soles of the feet nor the rasp on the outside. Do not leave the shoes on longer than four weeks without resetting.

In substance, remember that the foot is the weakest part of the horse; that the service of the horse is worth money to you. Take good care of the horse's feet!

James J. Hill's Idea of a Farm.

There will be much discussion of farming for the next few months from many angles, nor among them being the most useful size of farms. We do not wish to be one sided and shall always state fairly the large farm or combination arguments, but it seems to us that farming in this respect is the exception among businesses. Economy in the cost of supervision is the only reason for the expansion of the unit in any business, and land is more productive under the small farm system. Even if larger farm units are possible they are not desirable. We do not want the European regime of an overlord with tenant farmers. We want the greatest number of independent little farmers, who hardly need even one farm hand. James J. Hill has more sense than nearly all of the professors, and he delivered an opinion two years ago to the effect that the individual farmer must have fewer acres and more hoes.

Dipping Sheep For Scab.

In regard to the dipping of sheep for scab the South Dakota station gives the following rules: Dipping should, preferably be performed shortly after shearing, dipping all the sheep at one time. Select a lime and sulphur, tobacco and sulphur or an approved coal tar dip. Keep the temperature of the vat at from 102 to 105 degrees. Hold each sheep in the dip two minutes by the watch. Guessing at the time is not reliable. Completely immerse the head once. Ten days later dip the entire flock a second time. After the second dipping place the flock on a portion of the farm from which they have been excluded for at least four weeks previously.

Hundreds of People in Vicinity Here Will Welcome this Advice, Says Local Druggist

What will appear very interesting to many people here is the article taken from a New York daily paper, giving a simple prescription, which is said to be a positive remedy for backache or kidney or bladder derangement, if taken before the stage of Bright's disease.

Fluid extract dandelion, one-half ounce; compound kargon, one ounce; compound syrup sarsaparilla, three ounces. Shake well in a bottle and take in teaspoonful doses after each meal and again at bedtime.

A well-known druggist here at home, when asked regarding this prescription, stated that the ingredients are all harmless, and can be obtained at a small cost from any good prescription pharmacy, or the mixture would be put up if asked to do so. He further stated that while this prescription is often prescribed in rheumatic afflictions with splendid results, he could see no reason why it would not be a splendid remedy for kidney and urinary troubles and backache, as it has a peculiar action upon the kidney structure, cleansing these most important organs and helping them to sift and filter from the blood the foul acids and waste matter which cause sickness and suffering. Those of our readers who suffer can make no mistake in giving it a trial.

Local-Option Forces Meet at Boyne City Thorsday

W. P. PORTER, EAST JORDAN, CHAIRMAN

Hon. J. M. Harris Secretary of the Campaign Committee

Both Sides Putting up a Good Fight—Some Essential Features of the Local-Option Law

A meeting of the committee having the local-option campaign in charge was held Thursday in Boyne City and a permaneat orginization effected. There were representatives from Charlevoix, East Jordan, Boyne Falls and many of the townships in the county. W. P. Porter of East Jordan, was elected chairman of the county committee and Hon. J. M. Harris secretary. It was decided to open rooms for the transaction of all bosioess in connection with the campaign and rooms for that porpose was secured in the Bank block, with J. P. Eckstrom in charge.

Arrangements were made to secure prominent speakers from coonties, where local-option is in force, who will tell exactly how the law has worked out in their localities and the campaign will be poshed vigorously from now on.

The committee has received assurances that Hon. Perry Powers of Cadillac, and Hon. Grant M. Hudson of Schoolcraft, will address the people of this city, sometime dnring the campaign. As both are eloquent and convincing speakers, a large crowd should be out to hear them.

In the meantime the wets are not laying down, bot are vigorously poshing their side of the question and by the day of election, every voter will have had an opportunity to stody the question from all sides.

To aid in the campaign of education we print the most essential features of the law which it is hoped to enact.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN ENACT:

Section 1. That it shall be unlawful for any person directly or indirectly, himself or by his clerk, agent or employee, to manufacture, sell, keep for sale, give away or furnish any vinous, malt, brewed, fermented, spirituous or intoxicating liquors, or any mixed liquor or beverages, any part of which is intoxicating, or keep a saloon or any other place where any such liquors are manufactured, sold, stored for sale, given away or furnished in any county of this state on and after the first day of May next following after the adoption by the board of supervisors of such county of a resolution prohibiting the same, as provided in section thirteen of this act, so long as such resolution remains unrepealed: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to druggists, or registered pharmacists, in selling any such liquors under and in compliance with the restrictions and requirements imposed upon them by the general laws of this state and section twenty-five of this act, as amended.

Section 16. Any person, who himself, or by his clerk, agent or employee, shall violate any of the provisions of sections one or twenty-five of this act shall, for the first offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof be sentenced to pay a fine of not less than fifty dollars nor more than two hundred dollars, and the costs of his prosecution, and to imprisonment in the conoty jail not less than twenty days nor more than six months, in the discretion of the court. For the second and every subsequent offense so committed, whether in the same or any other county in this state where the provisions of sections one and two of this act are operative, he shall, upon conviction thereof, in any court of competent jurisdiction, be sentenced to pay a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, and to imprisonment in the State House of Correction and Reformatory at Ionia for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years, in the discretion of the court.

Section 25. Every druggist keeping a drog store in any county adopting prohibition onder this act shall make, and swear to or cause to be made and sworn to, a true written or printed statement signed and duly sworn to by himself or his clerk, on Monday of each and every week, giving the full name and residence of every person procuriog liquor at his drug store duriog the last week, the kind and quantity of liquor procured, and the date of procuring the same and the object for which each purchase was made, and on such Mondays shall deliver or mail, prepaying the postage thereon, the same to the prosecoting attorney of the county where such store is situated, who shall preserve the same in his office, and all such statements shall be open to inspection to all citizens.

Law Will be Enforced

Driven to a last extremity the liquor dealers have no other resource left other than the cry, "Prohibition does not Prohibit," and confronted with the evidence of conviction for violation of the local option law, where it is in force, they cry out. Whiskey can be procured at the drug stores. So it can, but under such roles and regulations that the druggist who violates the law finds he has a rocky road to travel. They are required to turn the light of full publicity on all their sales of liquor and, as reputable business men, are not going to turn law violators with the just retribution which you have met staring them in the face.

We have public officials sworn to enforce the laws and we believe that our officials will not violate their trust and if the people say the laws must be enforced, they will not fail to do their duty.

HAVE GOT DOWN TO BUSINESS

State Legislature Takes Important Action.

PRIMARY BILL HAS PASSED SENATE

Revision of the Liquor Laws Now Up to the House.

Places the Business Under More Stringent Regulations—Provides Penalties for Non-Enforcement of Law.

Last week the state legislature got bosy on the most important matters which will come up this session. Thursday the senate passed the Dickinson bill. The most material changes in the present law are:

Two primary days, the third Tuesday before the spring election and the first Tuesday in September.

No additional primary days allowed city of Detroit, but concession made so that polls may be kept open until 10 p. m.

Primary system mandatory on following: All counties now operating under the primary. On all cities of over 50,000 population, which means only Detroit, and on all cities in the state in which one party has adopted that system. In counties which have not adopted the primary system it is made mandatory that the question be submitted to the voters at the April election in 1910.

Primary nominations mandatory for the following: Governor and lieutenant governor, candidates for congress and members of the legislature.

Provision made for the nomination of candidates for circuit judge by direct vote on petition therefore.

Mandatory that an advisory vote be taken on candidates for United States senator and that candidates receiving the highest votes be certified to the legislature as the candidates of their respective parties.

The same day the house committee on liquor traffic agreed on the Ormshee liquor bill No. 2, Ormshee bill No. 1, which provided for the repeal of the county local option law, being still buried. The bill the committee agreed on provides these things:

If any licensee or his heirs desire to sell a saloon, a license may be granted, provided the purchaser has never been convicted of a violation of the liquor laws and can qualify under the provisions of the act.

It says minors, students and posted persons, and habitual drunkards must not be sold liquor.

The number of violations of the liquor laws to constitute a forfeiture of license, should be reduced from three to two.

Three-fourths instead of one-half of the monies collected from liquor licenses shall be credited to the city, village or township, wherein they are collected.

A provision is added providing a fine of $100 for any sheriff, deputy or police officer, who shall neglect or refuse to enforce the liquor laws and also removal from office.

It makes students and minors who purchase liquor as liable to punishment as persons who sell it.

It gives the city councils, in cities of more than 40,000 population, the right to extend the time for closing from 11 a. m. to 1 p. m. It requires agents of non-resident liquor manufacturers, to pay the regular license of $500 a year.

In case a saloon goes out of business, no new saloon may be started if the ratio is more than 100 to 500 people.

AT LIFE'S THRESHOLD

Is Miss Pleasant Geiken Called by Death

Graduate of Charlevoix High School and University of Michigan

The citizens of Charlevoix were universally shocked when they heard the news Sunday that Miss Pleasant Geiken's illness had resulted fatally and she was no more. It hardly seemed that a day had passed since she was among them in all the activities of health and youthful vigor, performing the duties of her noble profession, teaching, and now she had been stricken down just at the threshold of life.

Pleasant, daughter of Captain and Mrs. G. C. Geiken of Charlevoix, was born in Charlevoix, August 5, 1882, and graduated from the Charlevoix High school with the class of 1903, after which she attended the University of Michigan, from which she graduated in 1907. She accepted a position as teacher in the Charlevoix public schools for the year 1907-8. This season she has been teaching at Advance, up to last week when she was taken with her fatal illness, appendicitus, and in spite of all thot medical skill and loving care could do left a victim.

Miss Geiken was very popular in social life and church work, and the entire city unites in mourning her loss with her parents, and three brothers, Frank of Pellston, Cornelius and Harold of this city, and one sister, Miss Caroline of Chicago.

The funeral will probably be held ot the Congregational church Sunday afternoon, Rev. H. A. Putnam officiating, the long delay being caused by the anxiety of her brother Frank, who is spending the winter in California, to be present.

W. C. T. U. DEPARTMENT

Conducted by the local W. C. T. U.

After January 1, 1909, a traveler leaving Cincinnati over the Louisville and Nashville railroad may ride all the way to New Orleans, a distance of 901 miles, and will pass through only two towns or communities where the sale of intoxicating liquors is licensed. Louisville, Ky., and Nashville, Tenn. This ride will be so dry as to be almost dusty. No doubt this record could be duplicated in many sections of the country, and it is interesting to sit down and consider the growth of the prohibition territory.—The Alabama Citizen.

The Alliance News asks these pertinent questions under the caption, "Lifting Others as We Climb."

"Is it right to put drink in men's way, and then put them in prison for drinking it?

"Is it right to license a man to tempt others to go wrong, and then expect them to go right?

"It it right to profess to be sorry for the evils in the land, while not trying to put an end to them?

Righteousness (and not revenue) exalteth a nation," while legalized sin is a reproach to a Christian people."

A prosperous liquor dealer was boasting to a group of men standing near his saloon of the amount of money he had made. "I have made $1,000 in the last three months," he said. "You have made more than that," quietly remarked a listener. "What is that?" was the quick response. "You have made my two sons drunkards. "You have made their mother a broken-hearted woman. You have made much more than that, I reckon, but you'll get the full account some day?" Epworth Herald.

MICHIGAN FOREST RESERVE

Set Aside by President Roosevelt Before Retiring

Land Commissioner Ifuntley Russell received a proclamation from President Roosevelt, last week setting aside timber lands in Michigan for a state forest reserve.

The land lies along the Au Sable river in Ogemaw, Iosco, Oscoda and Alcona counties and according to the land commissioner, is comprised of about 165,000 acres. Action will at once be taken to withdraw the land from sale. Although the legislature as a body has taken no action to secure the reserve, its members were all highly in favor of the move and look upon it as a big thing for the state. Congressman Lond has put forth much effort to secure the reserve.

GRAND TRAVERSE DISTRICT LARGEST

In the State If Not In the Entire Country

OF METHOIOST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

Many Other Interesting Facts and Figures

Covers Ten Counties, Fifty-Four Charges, One Hundred Three Churches—Raises Large Amount of Money

Traverse City is the center of the largest Methodist district in Michigan, and whether there are any larger districts anywhere or not is not known. This district, of which the Rev. A. T. Ferguson is district superintendent, covers ten counties, Manistee, Wexford, Missaukee, Benzie, Grand Traverse, Kalkaska, Leelanau, Antrim, Charlevoix and Emmet. This is much larger in extent than any other Michigan district and is equalled by only one in the number of charges. The Port Huron district, with 54 charges, under the superintendence of the Rev. C. B. Steele, is that one. The Big Rapids district, with 53 charges is also a large district.

In the Grand Traverse district there are 103 churches. The difference in the number of churches and charges is explained by the fact that there are often three or even four churches in a charge, though of course, in the larger pastorates, the terms amount to the same thing. For instance, the Elk Rapids charge consists of churches at Elk Rapids, Elk Lake and Yuba, but the local churches constitute a charge.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the district consists of its Indian charges. There places of worship for the aborigines are Wabasemee, near Petoskey, Susan Lake, near Charlevoix, Kewadin, Northport, Honor and Fountain. The camp-meeting at Northport has come to be an annual gathering of some of the brightest and most influential Indians in the United States. Every class is represented there, trappers, farmers, ne'er-do-wells, as well as ministers and professional men. The sight is one that will never be forgotten by a white man, members of another, though naturally a religious race here coming together in a spirit of amity and brotherhood and he can not but think how different it is from the savage rites of years past.

The value of the churches of this district exceeds a quarter of a million dollars, $258,400 being the exact figures. There are 44 parsonages, valued at $51,200, as many as there are in the rest of the Protestant English-speaking churches together.

Six of these have been added since June, 1908. Blair, Custer, Antrim county, Levering, Sommit City, Colfax, Wexford county and Freesoil have dedicated churches since then. The structures are all substantial, creditable places of worship.

This district raises a large amount of money annually. Last year $2,495 was raised for missions beside the $842 from the Foreign Missionary society, and the $482 by the Home Missionary society. At the time of the last district report, there were 6,500 members, and doring the fiscal year preceeding that there had been 430 baptisms. When it was said there were 103 churches in the district, that did not cover the entire number of communities. Worship is held in conjunction with other churches in 18 school houses. There are 40 regular Sunday schools beside those in the school house, which if added would bring the total up to 120. There are 51 Epworth League chapters.

The district and the district superintendent are Methodist statistotions and to them is attributed much of the success of the church in building new churches and expanding in other ways. It will be seen that the superintendent of a district like the Grand Traverse one has an immense amount of work to do. Indeed, if some of the many men who say, whether they think it or not, that a preacher has no work to do, would put on the harness for one trip around the district, they would be willing to accept another position.

LIFE ISN'T WORTH LIVING

This Statement May be Generally Attributed to the Lack of Good Health

We want to talk to people who are nervous, who suffer frequent headaches, who don't enjoy their food, who are irritable, quickly lose their temper, are so tired and worn out that they feel they must give up and have become so despondent that life doesn't seem worth living. We know exactly what is the matter with people in this condition, and if they will follow our advice, we can tell them how to regain good health and that bonyancy of feeling which makes life seem all sunshine and happiness.

Most of the above described conditions are chiefly caused by catarrhal inflammation in the mucous membranes. This delicate web-like lining of the body becomes inflamed and congested until weakness and mental depression follows. The only way that this can be overcome is through a treatment of the blood. We have the treatment, and we are so positive that it will produce the results we claim for it that we will supply it to anyone with the understanding that we will return to them every penny they paid us in every instance where the treatment is not in every way satisfactory and beneficial in return.

We want you to try Rexall Muco-Tone, which is powerful nutritive tonic and body builder, and a mucous membrane alterative that cleanses these membranes and restores their natural and healthy functions.

Rexall Muco-Tone drives out all the catarrhal poison, restores the mucous cells to good health, tones up the whole system, allays inflammation, removes congestion, and stimulates the whole system to healthy activity. It is splendid for building up flesh and muscle tissue and removing all weakness.

Come to our store today and get a bottle of Muco-Tone, and after giving it a reasonable trial, if you are not satisfied simply tell us so, and we will hand back your money without question. Surely, nothing could be more fair than this. Two sizes 50c and $1.00. Ivy Drug store, A. B. Fleischer, proprietor.

Eighth Wonder of the World.

To realize fully the wondrous beauty of the Zambezi falls, Rhodesia, one must have time to linger and watch the ever changing scene. The depths of the chasm below are veiled from sight by the rising columns of opalescent mist, and above the yawning abyss the sun gluts and sparkles, weaving the drops into a magnificent rainbow. Three hundred feet below roars and boils the swirling flood as it emerges from the Boiling Pot, rushing on down the zigzag gorge between towering cliffs of rock, narrow, fierce and of unfathomable depth. One feels that Rhodesia is indeed thrice blessed to possess within her territories the eighth wonder of the world.—African World.

Endeavor to do thy duty and thou wilt know thy capacity.—Goethe.

COLIC IN HORSES.

Causes, Symptoms and the Common Method of Treatment.

It is more or less common on farms having a considerable number of horses to each year have one or more cases among them of flatulent colic. More especially is this true where horses are being fitted for the market, necessitating heavy grain feeding.

In a work issued by the United States department of agriculture, entitled "Diseases of the Horse," this subject is discussed in detail, in which are given the causes, symptoms and the common methods of treatment. It is pointed out that among the most frequent causes of this form of colic are to be mentioned sudden changes of food, too long fasting, food given while the animal is exhausted, new hay or grain, large quantities of green food, food that has lain in the manger for some time and became sour, indigestible food, irregular teeth, crib biting, and, in fact, anything that produces indigestion may cause flatulent colic.

The symptoms of wind colic are not so suddenly developed, nor so severe as those of cramp colic. At first the horse is noticed to be dull, paws slightly and may or may not lie down. The pains from the start are continuous. The belly enlarges, and by striking it in front of the haunches a drum-like sound results. If not soon relieved the above symptoms are aggravated, and in addition there are noticed difficult breathing, bloodshot eyes and red mucuous membranes, loud, tumultuous heart beat, profuse perspiration, trembling of the front legs, sighing respiration, staggering from side to side and finally plunging forward dead. The diagnostic symptoms of flatulent colic are the distension of the bowels with gas, detected by the bloated appearance and resonance on percussion.

The treatment for wind colic differs very materially from that of cramp colic. Absorbents are of some service, and charcoal may be given in any quantity. Relaxants are also beneficial in this form of colic. Chloral hydrate not only possesses this quality, but it is also a pain reliever. It is then particularly well adapted to the treatment of wind colic and should be given in one ounce doses in a pint of water. Diluted alcohol or whisky may be given or aromatic spirits of ammonia in one ounce doses at short intervals. A physic should always be given in flatulent colic as early as possible, the best being one ounce doses of Barbados aloes. Injections, per rectum, of turpentine, one to two ounces; linseed oil, eight ounces, may be given frequently to stimulate the peristaltic motion of the bowels and favor the escape of wind. Blankets wrung out of hot water do much to afford relief. They should be renewed every five or ten minutes and covered with a dry woolen blanket. This form of colic is much more fatal than cramp colic and requires prompt and persistent treatment. It is entirely unsafe to predict the result, some apparently mild attacks going on to speedy death, while others that appear at the onset to be very severe yielding rapidly to treatment. Do not cease your efforts until you know the animal is past help.

Wire Fence Corncrib.

In the drawing is shown a handy, inexpensive corncrib which possesses several advantages not possessed by the ordinary slat corncrib. It is made on 4 by 4 posts with pans at their summits to prevent rats from climbing in. The sills are 4 by 4, scantlings 2 by 4 and two feet apart. The fencing is nailed to these on all sides, and the door frame is similarly covered. The roof is made wide, so as to shed all possible water. The height, length and width may suit the farmer's convenience. A convenient width is about five feet at the floor, widening to seven feet at the eaves. Owing to the very open nature of this crib, corn dries more quickly than in a slat crib, and as there is less chance for water to lodge in the cracks the crib will be more durable than if built entirely of wood.

A Wise Decision.

After an inspection of the improved roads in Greene county, Pa., State Highway Commissioner Hunter has decided that all slate roads built in that county hereafter shall have a brick surface—a wise decision and one that will apply to the roads of many other counties in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, says the National Stockman and Farmer. One macadam road inspected by the commissioner had cost about $1,300 a mile in maintenance, and experience has shown that most macadam roads are costing too much if not that sum. Recognition of this fact is sure to result in more desirable roads in Pennsylvania. Other states where road legislation will be undertaken this winter should not miss the lesson New York and Pennsylvania have had in the final excessive cost of macadam.

THE DAIRYMAN.

Milk quietly, cleanly, quickly and thoroughly. Cows do not like unnecessary noise or delay. Milk at nearly the same hour each night and morning and milk the cows in the same order.

Value of Testing.

The other day we were in a dairy that netted its owner last year on a strictly creamery basis over $50 per cow. That man was too sharp to keep a lot of poor cows, for he tested them right along.—Hoard's Dairyman.

Discarding Cows in the Dairy.

In city dairies cows are frequently discarded because they are no longer giving milk in paying quantities. That would not be a sufficient reason for discarding a cow in a farm dairy if a good producer. In the latter good cows should not be discarded as long as they are able to produce well. The following reasons, however, would justify the farmer dairyman in getting rid of them: If they failed to reach a good standard in production, if they were unusually restless and irritable, if they were hard milkers and if they failed to breed regularly.

Light For the Dairy Barn.

The state dairy inspector of Maine, calling attention to the importance of plenty of light in the dairy barn, declares: The even distribution of light is an important matter, and the windows should be, if possible, so shaped and so placed as will allow the sunlight to fall some time during the day on all parts of the floor, searching out and disinfecting those places that easily become contaminated. This can be accomplished most readily where the windows are placed, as they are in our houses, perpendicularly, admitting more light thus than they would if placed the other way. An abundance of light, and especially of direct sunlight, has its certain beneficial effect upon the health of the cow, upon her production and upon her salableness.

Chapter 25

WHILE the man whom the town knew as Hugh Stires listened to the tale of the street preacher, another, unlike yet curiously like him in feature, had slowly climbed the hilly slope from the north by the sanitarium road. He walked with a jaunty swagger bred of too frequent applications to a flask in his pocket.

As he walked unsteadily along Hugh drank more than once from the flask to deaden the superstitious dread of the place which was stealing over him. On the crest of the ridge he skirted the sanitarium grounds and at length gained the road that twisted down toward the lights of the town. In the dubious moonlight he mistook the narrow trail to the Knob for the lower path to the cabin. As he turned into it the report of a rifle came faintly from the gulch below.

He quickened his steps and stumbled all at once into the little clearing that held the new made grave and Jessica's statue. The sight terrified his intoxicated imagination. His hair rose. The name on the headstone was Stires, and there was himself—no, a ghost of himself—sitting near! He turned and broke into a run down the steep slope. In his fear—for he imagined the white figure was pursuing him—he tripped and fell, regained his feet, rushed across the level space, threw his weight against the cabin door and burst into the room.

A dog sprang up with a growl, and in the light of the fire that burned on the hearth a man sitting at the rough hewn table lifted a haggard face from his arms, and each recognized the other.

The ghost was gone now before fire-light and human presence, and Hugh, with a loud laugh of tipsy incredulity, stood staring at the man before him.

"Harry Sanderson!" he cried. His shifty eyes surveyed the other's figure—the corduroys, the high laced boots, the soft blue flannel shirt. "Not exactly in purple and fine linen," he said. The impudent swagger of intoxication had slipped over him again, and his boisterous laugh broke with a hiccough. "I thought the gospel game was about played out that night in the chapel. And now you are willing to take a hint from the prodigal. How did you find my nest? And perhaps you can tell me who has been making himself so at home here lately?"

"I have," said Harry evenly.

Hugh's glance, that had been wavering about the neat interior, returned to Harry, and knowledge and anger leaped into it. "So it was you, was it? You are the one who has been trying his hand as a claim jumper!" He marched toward the table, and leaned upon it. "I've always heard that the devil took care of his own. The runaway rector stumbles on my manor, and, with his usual luck—Satan's luck we called it at college—steps in just in time to strike it rich."

"You were something of a howling swell as a parson."

He stretched his hand suddenly and caught a tiny object that glittered against Harry's coat—the little gold cross which the other had tied to his watch guard. The thong snapped, and Hugh sent the pendant rattling across the doorway.

"You were something of a howling swell as a parson," he said insolently, "but you don't need the jewelry now!"

Harry Sanderson's eyes had not left Hugh's face. He was thinking swiftly. The bolt from the blue had been so recent that this sudden apparition seemed a natural concomitant of the situation. Only the problem was no longer imminent. It was upon him. Jessica was not for him—he had accepted that. Though the clock might not turn backward, this man must stand between them. Yet his presence now in the predicament was intolerable.

"Well," said Hugh, with a sneer, "what have you got to say?"

"How much will you take for the property?"

"That's your game, is it? But I'm not such a muskull! Whatever you could offer, it's worth more to me. I know you, Satan Sanderson," he sneered. "You were always the same precious hypocrite in the old days, pretending to be so almighty virtuous while you looked out for No. 1. I saw through you then, too, when you were posing as my friend and trying your best all along to queer me with the old man! I knew it well enough. I knew what the reason was too! You wanted Jessica! You"—

Self control left Harry suddenly, as a ship's sail is whipped from its gaskets in a white squall. Before the words could be uttered his fingers were at Hugh's throat.

At that instant there was the sound of running feet outside, a hurried knock at the door and an agitated voice that chilled Harry's blood to ice.

His hands relaxed their hold. He dragged Hugh to the door of the inner room, thrust him inside, shut and bolted it upon him.

Then he went and opened the outer door.

* * * * * * *

The accusation of Prendergast had stunned Jessica's faculties. As in an evil dream she had seen the sheriff rise to his feet and methodically put the fragment of paper into his pocketbook. A moment later she was running up the dark path, her thoughts a confusion in which only one coherent purpose stood distinct—to warn him. They would know no need to hasten. If the man she loved had reached the cabin, she would be before them.

She stood before the door, her hands clasped tightly, her eyes on Harry's face.

"What has happened?" he asked.

"Men will be here soon—men from the town—I overheard them. I wanted to let you know!" she hesitated. It had grown all at once difficult to put into words.

"Coming here? Why?"

"To arrest a man who is accused of murder."

If her eyes could have pierced the bolted door a few feet away! If she could have seen that listening face behind it, as her clear tones fell, grow lustbet with recognition, amazement and evil suspicion—a look that her last word swept into a sickly gray terror! If she could have heard the groan from the wretched man beyond!

"Whose murder?"

"Dr. Moreau's."

Jessica waited with caught breath, searching his countenance. It was told now, but he must know that she had not credited it, that "for better, for worse," she must believe in him now. "I knew, oh, I knew!" she cried. "You need not tell me!"

"No," he said gravely, "I am not the man they want. It has all come back to me—the past that I had lost. Such a crime has no part in it, Jessica," he said, "you have tried to save me from danger tonight. I need a greater service of you now. It is to ask no question, but to go at once. I cannot explain why, but you must not stay here a moment."

"Oh," she cried bitterly, "you don't intend to leave! You choose to face it, and you want to spare me. If you really want to spare me, you will go! Why, you would have no chance where they have hated you so. Prendergast was killed robbing the sluice tonight, and he lied—lied—lied! He swore you did it, and they will believe it!"

He put back her beseeching hands. How could he explain? Only to get her away—to gain time—to think!

"Listen!" she went on wildly. "They will wait to carry him to the town. I can go and bring my horse here for you. There is time! You have only to send me word and I will follow you to the end of the world! Only say you will go!"

He caught at the straw. The expedient might serve.

"Very well," he said; "bring him to the upper trail and wait there for me."

She gave a sob of relief at his acquiescence. "I will hurry, hurry!" she cried and was gone, swift as a swallow flight, into the darkness.

As he re-entered the cabin the calmness fell from Harry Sanderson as a mask drops, and the latent passion sprang in its place. He crossed the room and drew the bolt for the wretched man who, after one swift glance at his face, groveled on his knees before him, sobered and shivering.

"For God's sake, Harry, you won't give me up?" Hugh cried. "You can't mean to do that! Why, we were in college together! I'd been drinking tonight or I wouldn't have talked to you as I did."

Harry drew his feet from the frantic hands that clasped them. "Did you kill Moreau?" he asked shortly.

"It was an accident," moaned Hugh. "I never intended to. I swear to heaven I didn't! He hounded me, and he tried to bleed me. I only meant to frighten him off. Then—then I was afraid, and I ran for it. That was when I came to you at Alston and we played." Hugh's breath came in gasps, and drops of sweat stood on his forehead.

"When we played!" he echoed. "How have you settled your debt, the debt of honor you once counted so highly? How have you lived since then? Have you paid me those days of decent living you staked, and lost?"

"But I will!" he exclaimed desperately. "If you'll only help me out of this I'll live straight to my dying day! You don't know how I've suffered, Harry, or you'd have some mercy on me now! Let me go, Harry, for my father's sake!"

"Your father is dead," said Harry.

"Then for old time's sake!" He tried to clasp Harry's knees. "They may be here at any minute! I must have been seen as I crossed the mountain! I thought it would never come out or I wouldn't have come! I'll go far enough away. I'll go to South America, and you will never see me alive again, neither you nor Jessica! For God's sake, Harry, listen! Jessica wouldn't want to see me hung! For her sake!"

It was the Harry Sanderson of St. James' parish, of the scrupulous conscience—whose college career as Satan Sanderson had come to be a fiery sore in his breast—who now spoke.

"Get up!" he said. "Have you any money?"

Hugh rose, trembling and ashen. "Hardly $10," he answered.

Harry considered hastily. He was almost penniless. Nearly all his share of the strike had gone to repay the forged draft. "I have no ready cash," he said, "but the night we played in the chapel I left a thousand dollars in my study safe. I have not been there since." He took pencil and paper from his pocket and wrote down some figures hastily. "Here is the combination. You must try to get that money."

Wait," he added as Hugh's hand was on the latch. He must risk nothing. He could make assurance doubly sure. "A half mile from the foot of the mountain, where the road comes in from Funeral Hollow, wait for me. I will bring a horse there for you."

Hugh crushed the paper into his pocket and opened the door. "I'll wait," he said. He darted out, slipped around the corner of the cabin and stealthily disappeared.

Harry sat down upon the doorstep. The strain had been great. In the reaction he was faint, and a mist was before his eyes. The die was cast. Hugh could easily escape. Until he himself spoke he would not even be hunted. He, Harry Sanderson, was the scapegoat, left to play his part.

He wrung Harry's hand.

How long he sat there he did not know. He sprang up at a muffled sound. He had still a work to do before they came—for Hugh! He saw in an instant, however, that it was Jessica, leading her horse by the bridle.

"I could not wait," she breathed. "You did not come, and I was afraid!"

Mounting, he leaned from the saddle and took both her hands in his. Still he did not kiss her.

"Jessica, you believe I am innocent?" he asked anxiously.

"Yes—yes!"

"Will you believe what I am doing is for the best?"

"Always, always!" she whispered, her voice vibrating. "Only go!"

He released her hands and rode quickly up the grassy path.

As she stood looking after him a dog's whine came from the cabin. She ran and released the spaniel and took him up in her arms.

As she did so a sparkle caught her eye. It came from the tiny gold cross lying where Hugh had flung it near the lighted doorway. She picked it up, looked at it a moment abstractedly and thrust it into her pocket scarce consciously, for her heart was keeping time to the silenced hoof beat that was bearing the man she loved from danger.

* * * * * * * *

Where the way opened into the gloomy cut of Funeral Hollow, Harry dismounted and went forward slowly afoot, leading the horse, till a figure stepped from a clump of bushes to meet him with an exclamation of relief. Hugh had waited at the rendezvous in shivering apprehension and dismal suspicion of Harry's intentions and had not approached till he had convinced himself that the other came alone. He wrung Harry's hand as he said:

"If I get out of this, I'll do better the rest of my life, I will, upon my soul, Harry!"

"You may not be able to get into the chapel," said Harry; "my rooms"—he felt his cheek burn as he spoke—"may be occupied. On the chance that you fail, take this." He took off the ruby ring, whose interlaced initials had once fortified him in his error of identity. "The stone is worth a good deal. It should be enough to take you anywhere."

Hugh nodded, slipped the ring on his finger and rode quickly off. Then Harry turned and walked rapidly back toward the town.

Chapter 26

AT the sound of steps in the jail corridor and the harsh grating of the key in the lock, Harry rose hastily from the low cot whereon he had been sitting and took a step forward.

THE campaign between the wets and drys is a reminder of how easy it is to see the faults of our opponents and how easy it is to forget our own. For years the general practice, in Michigan, has been to accept the saloon-keepers' licence money and then say to him, You shall not do certain things but do them quietly and you won't be disturbed, for we need the money.

Now when the moral sense of the people is aroused, when they say, we will no longer continue in partnership with a business, which is a curse to any community, and, which even those who are engaged in it do not attempt to defend, we are ton apt to forget that it is the business we condemn and not the man. Let us not forget that we are, as a people, equally guilty, if not more so, than the man who sells the liquor, for we have not hesitated to accept his money and let him take the blame of the misery caused by this accursed traffic.

Let us then, with a feeling of just shame, by our votes, say to our former partner, we, the people of Charlevoix county, are going to withdraw from the business of taking from the wives and children of our brothers, their just dues and from our fellowman their clear head and active brain and if you continue longer it will be at your peril.

INDIGESTION ENDS

Stomach Distress Vanishes Five Minutes Later

Eat Sausages and New Bread or Other Favorite Food Without Fear of Dyspepsia

You can eat anything your stomach craves without fear of a case of indigestion or dyspepsia, or that your food will ferment or sour on your stomach if you will occasionally take a little diapepsin after eating.

Your meals will taste good, and anything you eat will be digested; nothing can ferment or turn into acid or poison or stomach gas, which causes belching, dizziness, a feeling of fullness after eating, nausea, indigestion (like a lump of lead in stomach), biliousness, heartburn, water brash, pain in stomach and intestines or other systems.

Headaches from the stomach are absolutely unknown where this effective remedy is used. Diapepsin really does all the work of a healthy stomach. It digests your meals when your stomach can't. Each triangule will digest all the food you can eat and leave nothing to ferment or sour.

Get a large 50c case of Pape's diapepsin from your druggist and start taking today and by tomorrow you will actually brag about your healthy, strong stomach, for you then can eat anything and everything you want without the slightest discomfort or misery, and every particle of impurity and gas that is in your stomach and intestines is going to be carried away without the use of laxatives or any other assistance.

Health of the Horse.

It is a good plan never to dose a healthy horse. All he needs is good care and good feed. The good care includes, of course, regular exercise. It is just as bad for a horse to be all the time taking medicine as it is for a man. Do not do it.

How to Treat a Felon.

Take one egg, one tablespoonful of strained honey, one tablespoonful of spirits of turpentine, flour enough to make a moist paste and cover the finger with the paste. Renew when this gets dry. This gives speedy relief.

ROADS ON HILLS.

How They May Be Protected From Being Deeply Gullied.

Where a road is built on a steep grade some provision should be made to prevent the washing of the gutters into deep gullies. This can be done by paving the bottoms and sides of the gutters with brick or field stones. In order to make the flow as small as possible in side ditches it is often advisable to construct frequent outlets into the adjacent fields or streams or, if possible, to lay underground pipes or blind drains with screened openings into side ditches at frequent intervals, says a bulletin from the department of agriculture. The size of side ditches should depend upon the amount of water they are expected to carry. If possible they should be located at least three feet from the edge of the traveled roadway.

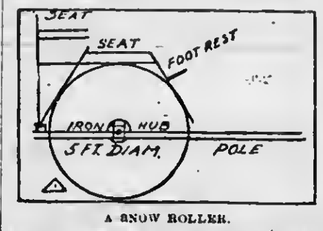
All side ditches should have a gradual fall of at least half a foot in every hundred feet. Their sides, particularly those sloping toward the roadway, should be broad and flaring, so as to prevent accidents as well as the caving in of their banks. Their bottoms should be wide enough to carry the largest amount of water that is likely to flow through them at any one time. Sometimes the only ditches necessary to carry off the surface water are those made with the road machine. The blade of the machine may be set at any desired angle and when drawn along by horses or by a traction engine cuts into the surface and spreads the earth uniformly over the traveled way.

VERMONT SNOW ROLLER.

Simple Device For Packing Down Roads After a Snowstorm.

R. G. Brock, a Vermont man, tells in the Rural New Yorker how to use and make a snow roller.

"Snow rollers," he says, "are used for rolling the highways after a snowstorm to pack the snow down, which when frozen makes a road ten feet wide. The diagram shows that they are made with two drums four and a half feet long and five feet in diameter, with a two inch steel shaft running through in which the drums turn independently, thus permitting them to turn a corner easily. The drums are made of two inch oak, the heads being double and hooped with two by half inch tire iron. The drums are hung in a strong frame, the pole goes through between them, and they are about a foot apart. A seat frame is placed on the main frame over the drums, with a place for tools, etc. Four horses are required to haul the snow roller on the level river roads and six on the hill roads.



A SNOW ROLLER.

AUTOISTS AND GOOD ROADS.

Kansas Club Formed For the Improvement of Public Highways.

The advent of the automobile and its use on country roads have caused an awakened interest in good country roads, and the owners of autos working in conjunction with the farmers should before many years result in greatly improved roads. The auto owners of Newton, Kan., have organized a club, which in Harvey county marks the beginning of an important good roads movement, and the success of this club in the work undertaken will be watched with interest, says the Farmers Advocate. If the plan is practical, state wide organization of a similar character will result.

The Newton club has a permanent roads committee to make frequent trips over the various public highways diverging from the city and make note of such spots as may require improving and confer with the road overseer of the township wherein these bad places exist and arrange to have the necessary attention given, the automobile club furnishing one-half of the money required to accomplish this.

It is also the purpose of the club to promote harmony among residents who own autos and residents of the rural districts. Naturally the farmers have a feeling of dislike toward automobile drivers. Some of the drivers are careless and take no precaution to avoid scaring teams they pass or meet. It is the intention of the club to dispel this feeling on the part of farmers, so that a better feeling will prevail all around.

Training Girls For Farm Work.

The Arseley House Colonial Training school at Hitchens, England, is devoting itself to the training of girls for life in the English colonies, more especially for farming life. Throughout the wheatfields of Canada there is a continual demand for women to help on the farms, but the ordinary servant is far from answering the requirements. The girls at Arseley House are taught plain cooking and breadmaking (which is not expected of an English cook, who gets her bread from the bakeshop), riding, driving, stable management and simple carpentering. These unusual elements of education are to make the girls resourceful and capable members of a community far from any center of civilization.

The Question of Local Option

This space will be devoted to the discussion of the question of local option. Only matter which is furnished us by regular representatives of each faction will be used as we see fit. The COURIER is not responsible for anything appearing under this head, nor does it in any way represent the policy of this paper.

Traverse City, March 8, 1909.

To Charlevoix COURIER readers:

I live in one of the most progressive cities in Michigan, and being a constant reader of the COURIER, of course I notice the discussion of the whiskey question. By occupation, a travelling salesman, my territory takes in the most of Wexford county, and has for years. The alleged statements in the papers, a few days since are absolutely false.

In the first place there is not a business man in Wexford county that I have seen within the last year who is not highly pleased with the results of local option, except the capitalist or loan shark, who got his $150 or $200 per year from each saloon keeper for signing his bond. Of course he misses this "hard earned" income.

I have customers in Wexford county, just over the line from Grand Traverse county, so have a good chance to observe the workings of the law. For example, three of my patrons, who were back from three to five months on their payments when Wexford county was wet, and their families did not have the ordinary things with which to keep house, nor respectable clothing to go to school or church. These same men today, are clothed well and so are their families, and they are caught up with their payments. They will tell you that they could not have done so if the saloon had been allowed to run under the shade of their homes.

George Spink of Mesick, was put out of business by local option and he told me he felt bad for a few days, but when he found he could save a good deal of license money and so he says, "What is more, I can go home and sleep, and get up in the morning without thinking I will meet an officer with a warrant for my arrest for selling to a minor or common drunkard, when I didn't know it." He says further, "I am making more money now than I ever did in a saloon."

There is a fellow or two, who claims the local option law is not being obeyed in Wexford county. Now listen. If the saloon keepers in any county would have obeyed the law one half as well as the local option law is obeyed in Wexford, there would have been no need of local option. If the saloon keepers are so patriotic and want to save the county from ruin, why in the name of common sense, don't he get up on the platform and tell the people so? Answer. He would not dare to make a speech favoring a saloon in a civilized country.

If they wish to find out what kind of a standing the business has, all that is really necessary for them to do is to go to school a few days with their children and observe the amount of dirt their children have to put up with, then they will know all about it. For instance, two young girls are good friends, all at once a little storm comes up and the remark is plainly heard all over the grounds: "Oh well, I guess you are not so much after all, your father is nothing but a saloon keeper." Imagine how it must make a family of children feel.

If the saloon is such a benefit to the country and is so much profit to the general public, why is it that a man can leave a position in a factory and tend bar for eight months, then go into business for himself and occupy the most expensive place in the city when he didn't have a cent to start with.

So far as having a law to regulate the saloon it is all a farce, and further, I don't believe there is a saloon keeper in northern Michigan today, who will take a chance and go on the stand and swear he is a law-abiding citizen. If they won't obey the law, as it is, they won't abide with any other law to regulate the business.

A COURIER READER.

There is more catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

Auditor General Fuller has secured data as to the proportion of saloons to population by counties in Michigan. The figures show that Wayne has 1,871 saloons, or one to every 207 of population; Kent 243 saloons, one to 581 persons; Saginaw 253, one to 231; St. Clair 129, one to 431; Houghton, 279, one to 259; Delta 161, one to 165; Bay 231, one to 274.

We have received a circular from VanPelt, issued by the automobilists of Chicago, against the wheel tax and asking contributions from auto owners to fight it. VanPelt says he has paid his tax and will willingly pay any reasonable tax to keep up good roads and thinks every owner of an auto ought to do the same. This is the proper spirit to take. We hope to have more on good roads next week.

Dr. A. M. Wilkinson and wife arrived home from New York, where the doctor has been taking a post graduate course, Monday night. They left New York for Washington Wednesday night, but on account of the terrible blizzard, arrived there too late to take in any of the inauguration except the fireworks in the evening. Coming on to Detroit Saturday they spent Sunday with Mrs. Wilkinson's sister, Mrs. Washburn. The doctor says that the work of distruction wrought by the storm was a most terrible sight to witness.

Mrs. F. N. Chapel and sons Wilfred and Franklin start tomorrow for a three month's trip west. They go via straits of Mackinac and St. Ignace to Minneapolis, where they will visit relatives and friends for about two weeks before going farther west. The remainder of their trip will be spent with relatives in Spokane and vicinity, at Kennewick on E. M. Sly's ranch, (where they will have strawberries in April); on the ranch of relatives near Portland and the last month or more in Seattle visiting friends and attending the first week of the Alaska Yukon Pacific Exposition, returning home via the Canadian Pacific R. R. about the middle of June.

Read the Label

Under the Pure Food laws baking powder labels now show the ingredients of which the powder is made.

Those who appreciate the importance to health and good baking of using a pure cream of tartar powder will read the back of the label carefully and make sure that the ingredients mentioned include cream of tartar.

The food law does not force consumers; it merely helps them to protect themselves. All good housekeepers want cream of tartar baking powders, and will not use alum substitutes in the food if they know it. As the ingredients are printed on the back of the label, all may know the facts.

Good baking powder is one of the most useful things in the kitchen; it is easily obtained at any store; the better it is, the more economical it is in cooking materials, and the more it conserves the health of the family.

CALUMET
Baking Powder
Received
Highest Award
World's Pure Food Exposition
Chicago, November, 1907
What does this mean?

It means that Calumet has set a new Standard in Baking Powder—the standard of the World.

Because this award was given to Calumet after thorough tests and experiments, over all other baking powders.

It means that Calumet is the best baking powder in every particular in the world.

And this means that Calumet produces the best, most delicious, lightest, and purest baking of all baking powders.

Doesn't that mean everything to you?

TASTY PLUM PUDDING.

How to Make the Chief Christmas Dessert Dish.

The custom of serving plum pudding as the most important dessert dish at the Christmas dinner has become so general in the United States that such a feast would now be regarded as incomplete without it. It should be made some time in advance, for if it is allowed to stand for several days or even for weeks it will be far more delicious than it could possibly be if made just in time for the dinner.

Take one pound of finely chopped beef suet, one pound of stoned raisins, one pound of currants, weighed after they have been cleaned and sorted; one pound of finely grated breadcrumbs, two chopped apples, two ounces of minced orange and lemon peel, the same quantity of thinly sliced citron, one ounce of chopped almonds, a teaspoonful each of ground cinnamon, ground ginger, grated nutmeg and salt and three ounces of finely sifted flour. Mix these ingredients together thoroughly, says the Delineator for December. Then beat four eggs with half a pound of brown sugar, add two wineglassfuls of brandy and half a teacupful of milk and combine with the other mixture. If too stiff thin by adding a little more brandy or milk. If too moist add more breadcrumbs. Beat this mass together for several minutes, using a wooden spoon for the purpose if possible.

In the meantime prepare a pudding bag of heavy linen or cotton cloth. Just before using it dip it in boiling water, then into cold water, wring dry, dredge it with flour and when the pudding mixture has been poured into the center of the cloth draw the ends together, tie them securely at the top, leaving sufficient room for the pudding to swell.

The water in which the pudding is to be cooked must be boiling rapidly when the mixture is put into it. The bag should then be moved about several times to facilitate saturation, after which the pot should be covered and the pudding left to boil for about five hours. During this time it will not be necessary to disturb the pudding, except to see that the water does not boil out so much that it falls below the top of the bag. To prevent this keep a kettle of boiling water to add as required.

When done remove the bag from the pot and let it stand for a few minutes to dry before attempting to release the pudding. Serve with a hard sauce composed of sugar and butter seasoned with brandy or with a soft sauce made after this recipe:

Put the yolks of four eggs in a double boiler with two ounces of sugar, a wineglassful of brandy or sherry, a suggestion of salt and the juice and grated rind of half a lemon. Whisk these ingredients about until they are thoroughly blended and have commenced to thicken. It is then ready to serve.

What interests me about Wagner, says a writer in London Opinion, is his affection for live beasts and animals. In "Siegfried" we have a dragon, and in "Lohengrin," as you are all aware, there is a very beautiful swan. When the late Sir Augustus Harris produced this latter opera something went wrong with the bird. Just before the rise of the curtain, therefore, the audience was considerably surprised and startled to hear the indignant voice of one of the stage hands resounding from the realms behind inquiring with characteristic vigor, "What's the matter with that infernal duck?"

A Big Rapids boy was recently sentenced to attend the Ferris Institute every day for two years, and to take up such studies as the instructors and the county agent shall deem best.

"The only good advertising is in the newspapers," declared Mr. Percival, secretary of the state association of business men, in an address at Traverse City. "And when you have newspapers that work for the interests of the town, you should patronize them instead of the fellows who are here today and gone tomorrow."

Traverse City business men held a meeting with the board of trade of that city last week, which was addressed by state speakers and was a very successful affair. The keynote was a readiness to take advantage of opportunities and a spirit of co-operation with the other west coast cities for the development of western Michigan.

George White, village marshal of Mancelona, has been taken in and he is sore. The marshall took a lumber-jack in tow and concluding that he was hungry bought him a hot supper and gave him a bed in the village prison. When he searched his boarder, the marshal found that he was well supplied with money and tobacco. He then started an investigation and learned that beside himself, four other charitably inclined persons had fed the lumberjack with warm suppers. The marshal's order to emigrate was obeyed without question.

"And he ate like he really was hungry," lamented White.

Finally, after making and breaking innumerable promises, the Ann Arbor railroad company has placed an agent at Boon. For ten years the people in that village have had to get along as best they could without the convenience of having an agent in the depot. E. A. Losie and other citizens took up the matter with the state railroad commission. Then promises were made and promises were broken. At last the commission said to the company that really an agent must be installed at Boon on or before March 1st or there would be doings that the Ann Arbor would not forget for several minutes. On the last day of grace, March 1st, the company installed William VanRiper, of Harrietta, and now Boon people hope that they will be able to do business with the company more satisfactory.

Much is being said by the newspapers in the 28th judicial circuit about the election of a judge. Wexford county has two candidates in the persons of Judge Fred S. Lamb and E. F. Sawyer of Cadillac, and Kalkaska county will no doubt support Ernest C. Smith of Kalkaska. Wexford and Missaukee counties will go solid for either one of the Cadillac men and who will get some votes from both Benzie and Kalkaska. Both Cadillac candidates are able lawyers and well respected and known throughout northern Michigan.

Clarence Fowler, proprietor of an Ithaca hotel, was sentenced by Circuit Judge Kelley Searl Thursday, to pay a fine of $175 and $25 costs and spend 90 days in the Detroit House of Correction for selling liquor without a license.

The evidence in the case was collected by Nightwatchman Charles Powers, who claimed that he had purchased several bottles of beer from the hotelman. Powers says that the beer was shipped to Fowler in barrels and transferred into bottles in the hotel. The complaint was made several days ago, but Fowler heard of it and left town, returning Monday. The officers secured a search warrant, went to the hotel and found Fowler under the bed. When arraigned in court he pleaded guilty, on advice of friends.

Prof. L. R. Taft, of the State Agricultural college, states that the poor crop of apples last year was due to the trees not being sprayed. He had taken figures given him by those who had sprayed their trees at least four times and some of them more. The average cost for spraying was about 40 cents per tree and the average profit $6 per tree.

A Home For Harriett.

By FRANK H. WILLIAMS.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

Harriett was a peculiar name for a cat; but, then, Harriett was a peculiar cat. Roger Webster surveyed her quizzically as she lay in the sun on the boarding house steps.

"Any feline but Harriett," he declared, "would at least feel mildly perturbed at the prospect of losing a home and a mistress."

"You'd think so, wouldn't you?" answered Bessie Roberts. Bessie was very pretty and wholly charming, but at the present time a little frown of anxiety wrinkled her forehead.

"I simply don't know what to do about it," she continued. "The landlady says that I've got to get rid of Harriett, and I can't find any other place so convenient to my work where I can live—I suppose—I suppose," she added wistfully, "that I shouldn't be so foolish over Harriett, but in some way she seems the only link between today and the other life. With all my people gone and Harriett some other place in this big city I'd feel too awfully, miserably lonely."

Roger saw that Bessie was near tears. "Poor, lonesome kiddie," he thought. And, leaning over, he stroked Harriett very carefully. Harriett arched her back, purred and rose slowly to her feet. Then, turning round, she jumped squarely into Roger's lap.

"What a sensible cat!" Roger smiled at the girl. "You see, she likes me very much. If only every one—that is, some one—liked me very, very much."

He glanced at the girl slyly. A little flush had spread over Bessie's face, and she kept her eyes fixed steadfastly on the cat.

"I only wish they allowed cats in my boarding house," he continued. "That's one of the troubles of living in a boarding house—you don't get the real, down pure comforts of home. Now, I'll tell you what we'll do," he cried, jumping to his feet. "We'll take Harriett with us and go on a tour of inspection in this neighborhood. We'll hunt up a nice, quiet street where there are little cottages instead of big houses, and when we see a nice, 'homey,' comfortable housewife in one of the homes we'll go in and ask her to keep Harriett for us."

"For us?" queried the girl, with a little laugh.

"Sure," continued Roger, unabashed. "You don't think Harriett belongs to you alone, do you? I think Harriett would resent any such idea as that. She likes me too well, and I like her too well. No, indeed, I have a minority interest in this cat."

The girl laughed and rose to her feet.

"Well, come along," she said. "I suppose it's the best think we can do, and as it's Sunday afternoon we ought to be able to find lots of the people home."

* * * * * * *

Roger helped the girl down the steps, and, calling to Harriett, they walked down the street. Harriett, fat, sleek and black, followed decorously enough until they reached a small, rather obscure cross street.

Roger happened to be looking back as they crossed this street and discovered Harriett very sedately sambling down the little thoroughfare.

"Come here, Harriett," Roger called and then whistled to the cat.

Harriett paid not the slightest attention, but continued her sedate walk away from Roger and the girl. Bessie called, but even to her Harriett paid no attention.

"Well, I declare!" cried the girl in surprise. "Harriett has always been peculiar, but she has never acted like this before."

"Let's follow her and see where she goes," cried Roger. "Perhaps she is looking for a home or perhaps she has a home already picked out."

"All right," said Bessie.

They turned back and hastened after Harriett, who was now, about, a fourth of a block ahead. The street was a quiet one. Neither Roger nor Bessie was familiar with it and had paid but little attention to it in previous times.

Now, however, they glanced curiously at the small, rather cozy houses which lined the sides. Although erected within recent years, they were almost old fashioned by comparison with the big buildings on the more important streets near by. It seemed as if the little street was a mere eddy in the swirling life and progress all around it.

"Oh, I like this street!" cried Bessie.

"It appeals to me, too," declared Roger, with conviction.

For several blocks they followed Harriett, who continued her steady course. At last they saw the cat turn into a gate in a charming stone fence, and they hastened after her.

The fence inclosed a cozy little cottage, well set back from the sidewalk. In the yard were a couple of trees, a flower bed or two and a delightful path, bordered by a low hedge, which ran up to the spacious veranda.

The little home had such a piquant, happy look that involuntarily both Roger and Bessie smiled as they gazed at it.

Then Roger laughed.

"Look who's on the veranda!" he cried.

Bessie looked closely and gasped. There was Harriett, curled up tightly in the blaze of the sun, as if she had been in the habit of lying there just like that day in and day out for years.

"Well," cried the girl, "Harriett seems to be perfectly satisfied with the place."

"Yes," acknowledged Roger, "I could be happy, too, in a home like this if I had the right person to share it with me." He looked directly at the girl. For a fleeting moment her eyes met his, and then, startled and with her face flushed, she ran up the path to the veranda.

"Why," she exclaimed as she reached the first step, "there's no one living here—the place is for rent." She pointed to a sign that had slipped from its position in a window.

"Why, so it is!" cried Roger. "Harriett can't stay here, of course—unless—unless"— He looked at Bessie with a smile full of meaning.

"Of course she can't stay here!" cried the girl, making a grab for the cat. "I wish we could find a home for her, though, in in a nice little place like this."

She caught the cat up in her arms.

"How Harriett would enjoy the place," mused Roger. "Look, there's a big open fireplace in the front room, and there's a piano, daddy place where we could have our piano."

"We?" gasped the girl. With her face aflame and with the cat clasped tightly she ran off down the path.

But Harriett, who had been purring very contentedly in her mistress' arms, now became very angry. She snarled and dug her claws into Bessie's coat until the girl was forced to put her down.

"Why, Harriett!" she exclaimed in pained astonishment. "What's the matter with her? She never acted that way before."

"I'm sure I don't know," replied Roger. "But look what she's doing now. Harriett may be a very peculiar cat, but she certainly knows a good thing when she sees it."

He pointed at Harriett, who, on being released, had torn frantically back up the path to the veranda. On the veranda she walked around in a circle once or twice and then curled herself up on the floor in almost the identical spot and almost the identical manner as before.

"Well, I never!" cried the girl. She hurried back to the veranda and, sitting down on the top step, began petting the cat. Roger lost no time in sitting down beside Bessie.

"Dear!" he cried as he managed to imprison one of her hands. "Dear heart, why not follow the road Harriett has pointed out? Why not let this dear little house be Harriett's home and at the same time a real home for you and me? Come, dear, it only needs a minister and a marriage license to make us all three happy."

"Oh, I will; I will!" she cried suddenly, throwing her arms about Roger's neck. "We'll none of us be lonely again!"

Harriett, with a sigh of content that appealed to the couple as almost human, rose from her spot and, purring loudly, rubbed her side against the arm with which Roger was clasping the girl.

Other Times, Other Manners.

Sir Algernon West strikes a curious note on the ear of the present generation in the course of a book of reminiscences, "Once Thy and Many More," when he states that in his youth it was considered highly improper for a wife to address her husband by his Christian name or for a son to address his parents without saying "sir" or "ma'am."

"I never heard my mother call my father by his Christian name," he writes, "and I recollect distinctly that the fame of a very fashionable and brilliant woman was seriously imperilled because after some great man's death a letter from her to him was discovered beginning with his Christian name.

"The formal 'sir' was current everywhere. At Eton we never recognized any departure from this practice, and letters between boy friends began, 'My dear sir.'

"A friend of mine dining with Lady Jersey heard her say she never recollected her father, Lord Westmoreland, though specially attached to her sister, Lady Lonsdale, calling her anything but Lady Lonsdale. And Henry Greville, who was present at the same dinner, said that he remembered his mother, Lady Charlotte, and her brother, the Duke of Portland, meeting in the morning at Welbeck abbey, when the salutations were:

"'How is your ladyship this morning?'

"'I am quite well. I am obliged to your grace.'"

How to Transfer Pictures to Wood.

The wood must first be made perfectly smooth and then varnished with copal or mastic varnish. When getting dry enough to allow its adhesiveness to be decidedly felt on being touched with the fingers lay the print, face downward, on the sticky varnish and rub down flat. When perfectly dry, which will probably be next day, remove the paper by wetting with cold water and then gently peeling it off. The paper will probably come off in rolls and the printer's ink remain

How to Extract a Splinter.

When a splinter has been driven deep into the hand it can be extracted without pain by steam, says the Woman's Home Companion. Nearly fill a wide mouthed bottle with hot water, place the injured part over the mouth of the bottle and press tightly. The suction will draw the flesh down, and in a minute or two the steam will extricate the splinter, and the inflammation will disappear.

How to Keep a Brooch Fastened.

If you are the owner of a brooch that unfastens easily hold the brooch in the right hand and with the thumb and forefinger of the left hand gently bend the pin until it is bow shaped. It will then remain securely fastened. Or use a small pair of pliers and bend the pin as jewelers bend them on the most expensive pins

She came toward him, her breath hurried, her cheek pale. Tom Felder's face was at her shoulder. "I have a little matter to attend to in the office," he said, nodding to Harry. "I shall wait for you there, Miss Holme."

She thanked him with a grateful look, and as he vanished, Harry took her hand and kissed it. He longed to take her in his arms.

"I heard of it only at noon," she began, her voice uncertain. "I was afraid they would not let me see you, so I went to Mr. Felder. They were saying on the street that he had offered to defend you."

"I had not been here an hour when he came," he said.

"I know you have no money," she went on. "I know what you did with the gold you found. And I have begged him to let me pay for any other counsel he will name. I have not told him—what I am to you, but I have told him that I am far from poor and that nothing counts beside your life. He says you have forbidden him to do this—forbidden him to allow any help from any one. Hugh, Hugh! Why do you do this? The money should be yours, not mine, for it was your father's! It is yours, for I am your wife!"

He kissed her hand again without answering.

"Haven't I a right now to be at your side? May't I tell them?"

He shook his head. "Not yet, Jessica."

"I must obey you," she said, with a wan smile, "yet I would share your shame as proudly as your glory! You are thinking me weak and despicable, perhaps, because I wanted you to go away. But women are not men, and I—I love you so, Hugh!"

"I think you are all that is brave and good," he protested.

"I want you to believe," she went on, "that I knew you had done no murder. If an angel from heaven had come to declare it I would not have believed it. I only want now to understand."

"What do you not understand?" he asked gently.

She half turned toward the door as she said, in a lower key: "After you had gone many things came back to me that seemed strange—something curious in your manner. You had not seemed wholly surprised when I told you you were accused. Why did you shut the cabin door and speak so low? Was there any one else there when I came?"

He averted his face, but he did not answer. She was treading on near ground.

"My horse came back this afternoon," she continued. "He had been ridden hard in the night, and his flanks were cut cruelly with a whip. You did not use him, but some one did."

She waited a moment. Still he made no reply.

"I want to ask you," she said abruptly, "do you know who killed Dr. Moreau?"

His blood chilled at the question. He looked down at her speechless. "You must let me speak," she said. "You won't answer that. Then you do know who really did it. Oh, I have thought so much since last night! For some reason you are shielding him. Was it the man who was in the cabin—who rode my horse? If he is guilty, why do you help him off and so make yourself partly guilty? The whole town believes you are guilty—I see it in all their faces. They are sorry, many of them, for they don't hate you as they did, but they think you did it—even Mr. Felder, though I have told him what I suspect and though he is working now to defend you!"

"Jessica," he urged, "you must trust me and have faith in me. I know it is hard, but I can't explain to you! I can't tell you—yet—why I do as I am doing, but you must believe that I am right."

"You speak as if you were sorry for me," she said, "and not for yourself. Is it because you know you are not in real danger—that you know the truth must come out, only you can't tell it yourself or tell me either? Is that it?"

"It is not that, Jessica," he said gravely, "yet you must not fear for me—for my life. Try to believe me when I say that some time you will understand and know that I did only what I must."

"Will that be soon?" she asked.

"I think it may be soon," he answered.

Her face lighted. The puzzle and dread lifted. "Oh, then," she said—"oh, then, I shall not be afraid. I cannot share your thoughts nor your secret, and I must rebel at that. You mustn't blame me—I wouldn't be a woman if I did not—but I love you more than all the world, and I shall believe that you know best. Hugh," she added softly, "do you know that—you haven't kissed me?"

Before her upturned, pleading eyes and trembling lips the iron of his purpose bent to the man in him, and he took her into his arms.

....The.... Singing Lady.

By MARTHA C. SANFORD.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

John Tyndal Seymour, Jr., had been tucked into his little shining brass bed at precisely 7 o'clock.

Being "tucked in," however, does not necessarily shut out the wonder world of lights and laughter and singing. John junior had discovered this all by himself, for often, as tonight, after calling to his nurse and getting no answer, he had crawled out with confidence from under his tight covers and stood by the window watching the grownups in the houses across the air shaft.

He had just climbed back for the third time by actual count when the singing began. John junior loved that singing more than anything else in the world.

He lay very still and flat on his little back, because he had found out that if one ear was buried in the pillow he could not catch all of the notes, especially the soft, low ones.

He had not been listening very long when he heard the hall door open and shut, and then he knew that his father had gone out. Perhaps he was going to find the beautiful singing.

John junior wished so hard that he might go too. He sat up in bed, half determined to follow. But, then, hearing the click of the elevator door, he knew that it was too late, and so lay back again with a sigh.

Suddenly, right in the middle of a note so high and sweet that it made John junior hold his breath in an ecstasy of happiness, the voice stopped. And for a long time it did not go on again. What had happened? Perhaps his father—no. If his father had found the singing, he would have just hid behind a curtain somewhere and listened. Of that John junior was sure.

At length, quite as suddenly as it had stopped, the singing began again. With a bound John junior was at the window. This was the song he loved best of all. He could hear the words quite clearly as they came floating up from the window far below:

Sweetest little fellow—
Everybody knows.
Don't know what to call him,
But he's mighty like a rose.

And little John junior, who had known no lullabies or mother's croonings in his lone babyhood, felt that he must follow and find where the beautiful voice came from.

After some groping he found his small woolen slippers, and after pulling them on very slowly and carefully he climbed out of the window and began the perilous descent of the fire escape.

The wind blew right through his nightgown, and the iron steps were very cold, but he kept bravely on, afraid only that the grownups in the flats across the air shaft might suddenly peep out from the curtains and see him.

The window at the foot of the long ladder stairs was open, just as John junior expected it would be, so he climbed in softly. The voice was still again, but he was sure he must be very near it.

By the light that came into the room through the transom he could see a big bed, with the covers all turned down as if waiting for some one to creep in, and so, as John junior felt quite shivery, he crept in himself.

He had no sooner drawn himself up into a snug little bunch than the singing began again, and so near that it made his heart thump hard. It came right in over the transom.

When the last sound of it had died away he heard a man's voice—his father's voice! So his father had followed the singing, just as he thought.

In a flash John junior was out of the big bed, had opened the door and went pattering down the hall toward the lights and laughter and singing.

Between the two big curtains he paused and gazed into the wonderland of the grownups. John junior waited until the song was over and then tiptoed in very softly.

"Please," he begged, "won't you sing about the 'little fellow' once more?"

And then weren't the grownups startled! John junior would never forget it. But at last the beautiful singing lady just gathered him up in her arms, and, her cheeks all pink and her eyes all shining, she sang the song he loved best in the world.

And after that John junior never knew exactly what happened, for he went fast asleep.

"Mighty like a rose," murmured the singing lady, looking tenderly down on the little flushed face nestled against her arm.

"Like a rose," repeated John junior's father reverently. And the singing lady, looking up, found the man's eyes not upon the child, but upon her.

"Take him," she urged, the quick tears springing to her eyes. "And don't, don't make it any harder for me, John."

Then for many nights John junior did not again hear the singing lady's beautiful voice after his nurse had tucked him in bed, although he lay flat on his back and listened hard with both ears.

He questioned his father about it, but got only foolish answers which he knew were not true. The idea of the singing lady going away to learn to sing more beautifully! That was nonsense! Who could teach her anything?

And it was just as silly to tell him that when she came back she would not sing for them any more, because lots and lots of people would expect her to sing for them in a big parlor. John junior knew better than that too. There were plenty of people to hear her in their house and in the houses across the air shaft.

At last John junior declined to be trifled with any longer.

"Why don't you write and ask her to come back?" he demanded.

"I have, dear," his father admitted, smiling a little wearily.

"And she won't come?"

John senior shook his head.

"Then why don't you go find her and bring her back?" urged John junior. "I'll go with you."

The more John junior's father thought about this plan the more it appealed to him. Finally one memorable day he put it into execution.

Once more John junior found himself in the wonderland of grownups—so many, many grownups—with millions of twinkling lights.

Suddenly out of the babel about him he heard a voice—the singing lady's voice. And there she was, more beautiful than ever, with her pink cheeks and her shining eyes!

It was very, very quiet while she sang, but when she had finished everybody applauded. John junior clapped too. Then out she came again, and this time she sang about "the sweetest little fellow."

And when, bowing and smiling, she walked quite out of sight she tossed one of her roses straight over to where John junior sat with his father.

"We've found her! We've found her!" he cried. "Come, daddy, let's go get her."

But the singing lady came to find them behind the velvet curtains, and as she gathered John junior into her arms and snuggled him up to her close, just as she had that other happy time, she heard John senior saying, "Mighty like a rose," and, looking up, she found his eyes upon her as before, full of love and unspoken admiration.

And, as before, she said, "Take him," but, with infinite sweetness, added, "and I will come back to him soon—and to you."

Nigerian Superstitions.

"The natives of southern Nigeria, Africa," says a traveler, "are extremely superstitious. Most of the people wear some kind of charm around their neck or waist in the belief that they are thus protected from illness or death from their enemies. When, however, the talisman has lost its supposed power and its wearer feels the hand of death upon him he submits to his fate—he is wanted by the fetich. To many places and things they attach a superstitious veneration. The rock found at the source of the river Imo is considered sacred and as such is safely guarded. Every village has its sacred grove, surrounded by human skulls, chatties and rotten eggshells on sticks.

"They believe that a spirit haunts the locality of a murder or the sacred grove at night, and no native would pass near such a place during the darkness. Any unusual phenomenon is by them attributed to a supernatural agency. Not only has a village its good spirit, but also its evil spirit, and when any misfortune of any kind overtakes a village a process of driving out the latter is indulged in with the help of much noise and every one beating the walls of the huts with sticks."

Parrots.

There is an idea that the brilliantly colored parrots do not talk. There is no reason why they should not, and many possess the imitative instinct. One of the most richly colored of all is the purple capped lory, from the Moluccas. Its whole body is crimson and rose, its wings are green, and its crest is purple. It is a thickset bird, like a big bullfinch, and can be highly educated. It is tame and gentle, an excellent "linguist" and mimic, never shrieks and is very amiable. It is also a ventriloquist. It is worth noting that some of the lories, which are very fond of flowers, have been poisoned by being given laburnum blossoms. There is a belief that parrots should not be allowed water to drink, but only sopped food. We believe that this is a mistake, which causes them great misery. They are not great water drinkers, and some species can go without it for a considerable time. But in their native state most of those that have been observed come regularly to the water holes to drink.—London Express.

"Suppose, doctor, this operation does not succeed?"

"My dear fellow, if it doesn't you'll never know it."

Faka African Hunters

"More big game hunters than you would believe," said a druggist, "take a lot of arsenic or strychnine or some such poison with them to Africa."

"What for?" the reporter asked.

"To shoot lions and tigers with," said the druggist, winking. "The safest way to shoot a lion or a tiger is with poison. I'll tell you how you do it.

"You kill a young deer or antelope, you rub the flesh well with poison and you leave it overnight near a stream where the big cats come to drink. In the morning you visit the spot. You may find two or three lions and things lying about, stiff and cold. You put balls through them—a mounted skin must have a ball in it, you know—and there you are.

"Yes, indeed," said the druggist, "there's many a big game hunter would never get a pelt if it wasn't for strychnine or arsenic."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

A lady who conducts a school of classical dancing hears some quaint remarks as she converses with her child pupils. One day preparatory to the first lesson in a dolphin dance she delivered to her class a little lecture on this fish. She described the grace of the dolphin, and afterward she described its habits and mode of life.

"And children," she said, "a single dolphin will have 2,000 offspring."

A little girl gave a start.

"And how about the married ones?" she gasped.—Los Angeles Times.

UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS

The Publishers of Webster's International Dictionary allege that it "is, in fact, the popular Unabridged thoroughly re-edited in every detail, and vastly enriched in every part, with the purpose of adapting it to meet the larger and severer requirements of another generation."

We are of the opinion that this allegation most clearly and accurately describes the work that has been accomplished and the result that has been reached. The Dictionary, as it now stands, has been thoroughly re-edited in every detail, has been corrected in every part, and is admirably adapted to meet the larger and severer requirements of a generation which demands more of popular philological knowledge than any generation that the world has ever contained.

It is perhaps needless to add that we refer in the dictionary in our judicial work as of the highest authority in accuracy of definition; and that in the future as in the past it will be the source of constant reference.

SHAKESPEARE CLUB ANNUAL BANQUET

Held at Baker's Inn Wednesday Evening

MOST BRILLIANT SOCIAL FUNCTION

Every One of the Members Were Present

Speakers All Were Enthused With the Spirit of the Evening—Most Beautiful Decorations

The annual boaquet of the Ladies' Shakespeare club, held ut Baker's Inn last Wednesday evening, wss a brilliant social fnoction, and replete with good things for the body and mind.

These onnual banquets, the only gatherings of the clnb, at which "mere men" are nllowed, have come to be looked forward to by the husbands with pleasurable anticipations, and they have always surpassed even the most optimistic predictions. If it were possible, the banquet of 1909 will go down in local Shakespearian circles as the most successful of all.

Every one of the twenty lady members was present and only one of the male adjuncts, Judge Mayne, was absent and he was represented by a family substitute.

The handsome new dining room had been cleared for the occasion and the forty guests were seated at the tables arranged in a hollow square, the center banked with palms surrounding a handsome marble bust of the immortal Shakespeare, who was thus a silent, though honored guest.

The place cards were beautifully hand painted, representing characters from various plays and were the work of Miss Irene Harsha. The tables were beautifully decorated, purple and gold, Shakespear's colors, predominated with an abundance of violets artistically arranged. In a corner, partially screened by palms and ferns, an orchestra composed of some of rising geoeration of the Shakespeare club, Miss Amy Harsha, Misses Helen and Dorothy Armstrong, Leslie and Percy Crane and Hurbert Paddock discoursed excellent music throughout the discussion of the menu, which besides being of the best in every respect, was most excellently and expeditiously served.

After the tables were cleared, the president of the club, Mrs. J. B. Thielen, introduced as toast mistress, Mrs. R. W. Paddock, who proceeded to fill this trying and difficult position in a manner that would have done honor to a Chauncey M. Depew. It is impossible to select as worthy of special mention any particular one, where all did so exceptionally well, suffice it to say that the "Shakespeare" ladies have all proven apt and interesting after-dinner speakers. The representative of the sterner sex found himself put to the test to preserve the reputation of the Lords of Creation as leaders in this line.

One feature that hnraished much amusement was an original, "Sonnet," set to highly classical music, which was rendered by a male quartette composed of Messrs. Marting, Armstrong, Hampton and Woodley.

The menu disposed of before this was as follows:

MENU

Hyster Cocktail

Celery Salted Almonds Radishes

Chicken Consomme, whipped cream

Wafers

Fried Smelts Potato Balls

One-half Broiled Chicken

French Fried Potatoes

Fruit Frappa

Peas

Hot Rolls

Fruit Salad Orange Baskets

Strawberry Sundae

Angel Food Devil's Food

Coffee Candies

The intellectual feast was as follows:

1. Greeting, President Mrs. J. B. Thielen. "I shower a welcome on ye welcome all."

2. Toastmistress, Mrs. R. W. Paddock. "Say, what abridgement have you for this evening? How shall we beguile the lazy time if not with some delight?"

3. My Honored Lord, Mrs. G. W. Priest. "'Tis he, I ken the manner of his gait. He rises on the toe; that spirit of his in aspiration lifts him from the earth."

4. Bee or Butterfly; to grind or not to grind, Mrs. S. A. Marting. "So works the honey bee," but "The hand of little employment hath the daintier sense."

5. Should husbands talk shop at home, Mrs. J. A. Auld. "Bosom up my counsel, you'll find it wholesome."

6. Shakespearean Sonnet to ladies of the club, Quartette. "So musical a discord, such sweet thunder."

7. The friends we meet at the club, Mrs. H. S. Harsha. "I count myself in nothing else so happy, as in a soul remembering my good friends.

8. The Shakespeare women, Mr. H. L. Giddings. "A child of our grandmother Eve, a female, or for thy more sweet understanding a woman."

It was quarter to eight when the guests were ushered into the dining room and it was "midnight's witching hour" when they dispersed, after what all agreed, was the most enjoyable evening of the year. The men are already looking forward to the banquet of 1910 and wishing that it was a monthly, rather than an annual function. In the words of the author of the original sonnet, "this ladies' Shakespeare club is sure a winner.

CHARLEVOIX BOY THE WINNER

Allie Moore Victor in International Race

HELD AT LONDON FEBRUARY 24

Americans Take First, Second and Third Prizes

London Sportsman Tells the Story of the Night—Moore Made a Brilliant Success

The London Sportsman of February 25 tells the story of how Allie Moore, "the Charlevoix boy," won the great international roller skating race the night before.

"Grand sport took place at Olympia last night, but after what happened it is impossible to hark the fact that so far as racing on roller skates is concerned Englishmen are open to take a lesson from our American cousins. Three of them came specially from the States to compete, and when the London Preliminary Competition final was finished they occupied the first, second and third places. The nineteen Englishmen that entered, the majority of whom competed, were amongst the "also ran." The Americans won entirely on their merits, and were thoroughly fair in their methods. It was a great night's sport—the final heat being quite electrafying. It was won by Allie Moore, who holds nearly all the American records. He finished first in his semi-final heat from John Davidson, and won comfortably, too, although he cut matters fine. Then Harley Davidson had no difficulty in reaching home first in the second semi-final. It was in the final that the great race was seen, for although Allie Moore is said to be America's greatest skater, he had never in his career defeated Harley Davidson, who is also a very fine mover. Both skated in different interests, and were thoroughly on their mettle when the race was called on, the others that qualified being John Davidson and D. D. Bennet, rink master at Olympia. All four were in line until the last of the 6 2-3 laps necessary to complete the Olympia mile. Then "Hurley" went away with a burst and by appearances took Moore by surprise, for 200 yards from home he led by anything from six to eight yards—a great advantage with such fast skaters. For a hundred yards it appeared as if Moore would fail to get up, although he was gradually lessening the gap; but entering the straight, about fifty yards from the finish, he put in a brilliant spurt, and drew up so remarkably that ten yards from the finish he was level. It was then a struggle for two yards, but Moore was just a little too fast for Davidson, and won first prize of $1,940 by only a foot."

Moore's time for the semi-final was 3:18 3-5 and the final 3:13 3-5. Harley Davidson's time on the final was given as the same, he being so close to Moore, the judges were unable to catch the exact time. John Davidson's time was 3:15 and Bennett's 3:17 4-5.

FORWARD HO

The guiding star of Temperance is shining brightly now,
Her banner is floating proudly aloft, and glory is on her brow,
But for many weary decades, she was leading a hope forlorn,
And her beautiful banner of purity was hanging limp and torn.

But the flag of Alcohol every where is waving over the land,
Up on the height of the mountain top, and down on the white sea sand,
And especially in the cities where the population was great,
Men bowed down and worshipped before this mighty potentate.

The incense offered was sometimes gold, and sometimes a fine old form,
And often the beds and clothing needed for keeping the children warm,
Food, education, parents' home and friends; Alas the pain,
And all these sacrifices were for the sake of getting gain.

Whose was the gain? not the ruined soul who expired with drunken breath,
Not the imbecile, nor the lunatic, who inherited menial death,
Not the weeping children in orphan homes, who mourned for their parents gone,
Nor the desolate widow left forlorn, as the lonely years roll on,

Not the anguished parents whose bright young son, is treading the downward way,
Nor the beautiful daughter whose "company" is leading her far astray,
Not the criminal thousands in prisons, and others from warning I must refrain,
Then tell me candidly if you can, who it is that gets the gain.

While our legislators of nations, and state, are playing at hide and seek,
With Bacchus and Temperance in the scales till they hear what the people speak,
Let the people arise in their majesty, and say, in this land of the free,
That this Giant Temptation, this curse of the nation, shall hence force cease to be.

But for generations yet to come this nation must reap the fruit,
Of this mighty evil that spreads so wide, and has taken so deep a root,
For disease of the body, disease of the heart, and may be of brains a lack,
Will follow their lineage onward down, from the fourth generation back.

It is better late than never they say, so now let us get at work,
With as mighty a revolution, as in the present day of the Turk,
And by God's help, we will banish this demon, down to his own domain,
Where his blighting shadow shall never return, to wither our land again.

MARY MORROW.

LARGE CROWD PRESENT

At the Annual Meeting of the W. C. T. U.

Plans are Made for Next Year and the Spring Campaign

An intensely interesting and enthusiastic W. C. T. U. meeting was held Friday at the home of Mrs. W. J. Weikel. This was the annual meeting. A report from the secretary of the work done during the past year was given, also from the treasurer and the superintendents of departments.

Officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows:

President—Mrs. Jennie Allcox.

Corresponding Secretary—Mrs. Lottie Markam.

Recording Secretary—Mrs. Sarah M. Wilkinson.

Treasurer—Mrs. B. B. Blair.

First vice president—Mrs. H. A. Putnam.

Second vice president—Mrs. C. V. Cook.

Third vice president—Mrs. H. C. Cooper.

Fourth vice president—Mrs. P. D. Campbell.

The superintendents of departments will be chosen later, also programs for the coming year will be made out.

The devotional exercises were led by Rev. H. A. Putnam.

Mrs. P. J. Howard, eleventh district W. C. T. U. president was present and gave an interesting talk on how the W. C. T. U. and the women of Petoskey are assisting in the local option campaign in the federation of the different societies in Petoskey and what we might do in Charlevoix. Mr. Stacks followed with a talk on what has been done and is being done in our county, outlining the work.

An animated discussion was had bringing in some of the schemes of the other side. The time was too short for all of the program, which had been provided, save the musical numbers.

The Misses Agnes and Josephine Orlowski sang a beautiful duet, "Shadows of the Evening Hours," Miss Eva Munyon accompanying on the piano. Miss Marion Saunders a piano solo. Misses Helen and Dorothy Armstrong violin and piano duet. Misses Marcia Goss and Mildred Wright a piano duet.

A most bountiful supper was provided. Probably sixty-five persons were present and over twenty members. Six ladies gave their names as members to the W. C. T. U.

During the meeting word was received of the passing away of one of our members, which cast a shadow in our midst, Mrs. J. A. Hawkins. Mrs. Hawkins has not been in health for two years or so. She will be greatly missed, but we trust that our loss is her gain, and we pray that God may comfort the bereaved husband, daughter and sisters in this their time of affliction.

Will be Built by Northern Michigan Company

Other Plans of the Company—Interesting History of the Dahlia

The Northern Michigan Transportation company announces that the Kansas will be used as an excursion steamer for Charlevoix, Petoskey, Harbor Springs, Mackinac Islands and Sault Ste. Marie, making the trip twice a week.

It is further announced that the company will build a new steel passenger boat to run between Chicago, Charlevoix, Petoskey, Harbor Springs and Mackinac Island. The new boat will be 400 feet long over all, and will have a speed of 20 miles an hour. She will accomodate 700 passengers in her berths and will seat about 250 people at the tables in her dining saloon. This new boat will be in service at the opening of the 1910 season.

The steel light house tender Dahlia, which the company has lately purchased from the government, will be used as a freight boat between Chicago and Kenosha, Wisconsin. The Dahlia has had an interesting history during her thirty-five years of service, having saved scores of lives. Some of our most distinguished naval officers have seen service on her, among them being, Admirals Dewey, Schley and Sperry, Captains Clark, Young and others.

GUSTAVE JERRICHOW DEAD

Had Lived in Hayes Township Sixteen Years.

Gustave Jerrichow, a well known and highly respected citizen, died at his home, in Hayes township, Friday, March 12, of cancer of the stomach. Mr. Jerrichow was born in Germany, coming to this country forty three years ago and settling in Calumet county, Wisconsin, removing from there to Hayes township sixtern years ago the coming May.

He leaves besides his wife, six children, three sons, Gustave, Herman and Charles of Hayes township, and three daughters, Mrs. Loren Hamlin of Hayes, Mrs. Tom Petoskey of Petoskey, and Mrs. Ed. Mock of Flint.

The funeral was held from the house Monday afternoon. Rev. Dr. Wright officiating. Burial at Brookside.

LARGEST AND BEST ATTENDED

Teacher's Institute Ever Held in Charlevoix County

WAS THAT HELD AT EAST JORDAN

Papers and Discussions were Along Helpful Lines

Over Eighty Percent of Teachers were Present Resolutions Favor Unit System Opposed to Uniform Text Book Law

The teacher's institute held at East Jordan March 5 and 6, was one of the best attended institutes ever held in the county, over eighty percent of the teachers being present, besides a large number of patrons, who attended all the sessions.

Superintendent Gilbert of Traverse City, had the first place on the program with the subject, "The child, its growth and development."

To study the growth and development of the child, to determine the periods when he is able to do much or little work, to find out what he likes to do and why, to secure the even development mentally and physically, these and other points in the study of human nature were shown to be very valuable assets in the make-up of the successful teacher and Mr. Gilbert's talks on this subject will start many teachers on the right solution of problems that often give trouble.

Miss Coltrin of Boyne, gave a very interesting paper on reading and literature. She urged the necessity of preparation when a poem is to be taught. She also advised teachers never to attempt to teach a poem or piece of literature of any kind that they did not know and like, showing how impossible it is for a teacher to create an interest in anything in which they themselves are not interested.

Superintendents Fuller and Bell gave some very interesting and helpful talks, as well as Misses Freiberg and Walsh, followed by a talk by Professor Butler on "Geographical influences in History," the discussion of which was led by Superintendent Woodley.

Miss Reed and her class in number work, furnished one of the most interesting numbers on the program.

Miss Scroggie of Bay Shore and Miss Maddaugh of Irontoo, who is, by the way both principal and grade teacher in the four room school there, gave some interesting pointers concerning the rural schools. Both of these teachers are agressive and belong to the class of teachers who realize, that the rural teachers cannot possibly do all that is to be done in rural schools but who are willing to do all that they can and do it cheerfully.

LOOKS LIKE A GOOD THING

Does the Law in Regard to County Road System.

WHICH WILL BE DECIDED APRIL 5

Everybody Pays Their Just Share Toward Good Roads

Roads Built Are Permanent and Not Patchwork—The Rights of Townships Are Protected.

The COURIER does not intend to lose sight of the important subject of good roads, nor let it be overshadowed by the question of local option in the spring election. When we have a saloonless town, with good permanent roads leading into it, we have reached nearly an ideal condition and both can be secured by the votes of the electors this spring. Before you cast your vote against the county road system, be sure you understand the following points.

For every mile of permanent road built, in compliance with the rules of the state highway department, you receive the state reward, the roads built then will be permanent and not patched up. The county roads are built as the result of careful plans by the county road commissioners, with the approval of the supervisors, and every year adds more mileage to the permanent roads of a county and decreases the mileage which has to be taken care of by the townships. Every taxpayer in the county pays their portion toward the building of permanent country roads, which are the most valuable asset that a county can have.

A point not generally understood in regard to the law, and which its opponents make a point of, is that the permanent roads would not be built so they would benefit the particular township of the objector. To answer that the law provides that in a county where the county system is in operation, that in any township where any road has not been built in any one year and which shall raise sufficient funds to build a mile or more of state reward road in any year, they shall be entitled not only to the state reward but they will be entitled to an equal amount from the county, provided that they have paid taxes in the county road fund equal to that amount. If not, they can draw from the county an amount equal to the amount paid by the township in question into the county fund. Another proviso that is important is that, if a township in which the county has not built any road for a period of one year, shall bond or otherwise provide for building two or more miles of State reward road in any one year, they can draw the state reward for the road they build and the same amount from the county as in the previous statement and also draw that amount from the county each year as long as they keep the road in as good condition as when approved by the state highway commissioner. The benefits of these provisions can be easily seen. In the event that any township should be "overbooked" or neglected by the county highway commissioner, it gives them an opportunity to provide for their own roads and not only get the state reward but get their money back from the county.

Another point to remember is that no county, which has adopted the system, has ever voted to rescind their action. Don't vote hastily on this important question but look into the matter carefully. Send to the State Highway Department and get a copy of the law and read its provisions before making your decision.

TELLS HOW TO MIX IT

Directions to Prepare a Simple Home Mixture.

Tells You How to Overcome Rheumatism With Simple Recipe, Which is Easily Mixed

A well-known authority on rheumatism gives the following valuable, though simple and harmless, prescription, which any one can easily prepare at home.

Fluid extract dandelion, one-half ounce; compound kargon, one ounce; compound syrup sarsaparilla three ounces.

Mix by shaking well in a bottle and take a teaspoonful after each meal and at bedtime.

He states that the ingredients can be obtained from any good prescription pharmacy at small cost, and, being of vegetable extraction, are harmless to take.

This pleasant mixture, if taken regularly for a few days, is said to overcome almost any case of rheumatism. The pain and swelling, it any, diminishes with each dose, until permanent results are obtained, and without injuring the stomach. While there are many so-called rheumatism remedies, patent medicines, etc., some of which do give relief, few really give permanent results, and the above will, no doubt, be greatly appreciated by many sufferers here at this time.

Inquiry at the drug stores of this neighborhood elicits the information that these drugs are harmless and can be bought separately, or the druggists here will mix the prescription for our readers if asked to.

How to Relieve Insomnia.

One of the best insomnia remedies for a nervous woman is to take a hot bath just before going into bed. In this bath it is not necessary that there be any soothing ingredient, for the heat is relaxing. In the tub the body should be immersed for fifteen minutes in water that is hot without being exhausting. After leaving the tub the person must go directly to bed and sleep in a well ventilated room. It is excellent to have a glass of milk on a stand by the bed where it can be reached in the night without getting up. Then if wakefulness comes the liquid should be taken slowly, and it is likely to be helpful in quieting the nerves of the body as well as of the stomach.

HANDLING THE BROOD SOW.

The man who gives proper attention to the care of the brood sow and her litters and gets the young pigs started right has solved one of the great problems connected with successful pork production. The men who have made the greatest success as breeders of pure bred swine have attained success by attending to all of the details of the business, and if it has proved profitable for them to attend to the small things connected with their business why not for the man who is growing market hogs?

My experience teaches me that the easiest method of making sure of saving the litters is to begin by feeding the brood sow a proper diet for four or five months before the pigs are farrowed, says a successful swine breeder. They should be fed some form of warm slop that is composed of good, wholesome muscle and bone building foods, such as wheat middlings, ground oats, oilmeal, roots and clover. The man who gives his sows good, dry sleeping places and feeds along the above lines is invariably the man who always has good luck in saving these early litters.

Sows that are fed on corn and other highly concentrated rations during this time are quite certain to have more or less difficulty at farrowing time, and we need not wonder if they run after their pigs and chase them up in one corner of their pens or even turn upon them and devour them.

It is only by feeding the brood sows under the right conditions that such troubles can be avoided. The sow that has a caked udder that is the result of being fed a heat producing ration suffers severe pain and cannot be blamed for being restless and not lying still for the little pigs to suck. How much better to have our sows trained so that we could go in with them and bathe their udders with warm water when they are sore and fevered!

We find that nothing pays us better than to be on friendly terms with our brood sows at farrowing time, and for that reason it is best to remove them to their farrowing pen at least two weeks before they are due to farrow. This gives the feeder or herdsman time to get acquainted with the sows, and they have a chance to get accustomed to their new quarters and quieted down before farrowing time arrives.

The most severe losses in a herd of swine come at farrowing time, and a large proportion of these losses are unnecessary if the sows have good farrowing houses and judgment is used in caring for them during this most critical period. Many pigs are lost by accident at the time the sow is farrowing, some by feeding the sow too much soon after farrowing and others from damp, filthy nests and sudden changes in the weather. When a man is on friendly terms with his brood sows it will pay him to be with them at farrowing time and take the young pigs as fast as they come and place them in a nest or basket away from the sow until she has completed the farrowing act and then place them with her and see that each pig finds a teat and gets a good start in life before leaving. I believe that an average of two pigs to a litter can be saved by taking these precautions.

One of the most difficult problems that confront the hog grower is to find a way to prevent scours and indigestion. I believe that this complaint comes largely from insanitary conditions, and for that reason it will prove an excellent plan to sprinkle the nests and floors of the pens with lime and spray the inside of the houses with a mixture of one part crude carbolic acid and fifty parts crude oil. There are numerous commercial disinfectants on the market, but this mixture is very cheap and effective.

We prefer wheat middlings as a grain feed for our sows, although other feeds should be fed in connection with it. Bran, ground oats, corn in limited quantities and tankage are all good feeds and will bring results when properly proportioned. The feeder must use his own judgment as to the condition of the sow and the pigs. No man can tell just how much care and attention a sow and her pigs will require. Constant attention alone will decide the question.

Start the pigs right and push them every day from birth to maturity on a well balanced ration and they will make a rapid and uniform growth. A uniform lot of pigs look better, feed better and will sell better on any market in the country.

THE VETERINARY.

Place a sick animal in a dry box stall with plenty of bedding and sunlight. In cold weather place a blanket on the animal. Feed sparingly with digestible food and keep the manger sweet and clean. Water should be pure and warmed when necessary.

Cure For Scours.

One who has tried it recommends corncob tea for calves and colts troubled with scours. It is made as follows: The corncobs are chopped up into pieces and put into a kettle with enough water to cover them and are then steeped over a slow fire. The fluid is then drained off and cooled and used as a drench for the affected animals.

Treatment For Scratches.

In old cases of scratches where the skin under the fetlock tends to crack and is dry and scaly apply cerate of cantharides to blister the parts, and as it will remove the scurf new skin will form and be apt to remain sound if the parts are not washed during cold weather. In ordinary cases do not wash the parts; poultice for a few days with hot flaxseed meal and then apply sulphur ointment two or three times daily.

Foot Rot In Cattle.

For foul or foot rot in cattle cleanse the parts thoroughly and touch with a feather dipped in water three parts and sulphuric acid one part, or the sore may be cleansed and then smeared with pine tar and a bandage tied between the claws and about the pastern to keep out the dust. Remove the cause by filling up all low places in which puddles may be formed.

Thumps In Pigs.

Thumps is a pig disorder that is very likely to affect young swine. Avoid excitement and sudden frights and give a dose of three grains of digitalis in the feed. Get the patients out in the air and sunshine and encourage exercise by placing the feed trough quite a distance from the bed. If the hogs can be made to go about more and more the weak condition of the heart will disappear. Of course in this connection the food must be of a tonic character. Use a few oats and introduce by degrees a little oilmeal.

How to Relieve Effects of Strain.

After having done an unusually hard day's work or undergone some unaccustomed strain such as is likely to leave the muscles sore and stiff mix fifteen drops of the tincture of arnica thoroughly in one-half glass of water and take one teaspoonful of the mixture every hour until relieved. This will give much quicker relief than when applied externally. It is also one of the best remedies to promote absorption, remove soreness and prevent inflammation in any wound or bruise of the soft parts of the body.

How to Press Trousers.

Before pressing the trousers brush them thoroughly, then fold the same together, lay on a board and brush again with a whisk broom or clothes brush. Make a light suds of white soap and water, wring out a cloth that has no lint and spread over the trousers. Now with a hot iron press hard up as far as the bottom of the pockets, making the crease the same front and back. Take off the cloth and brush again to remove any shine and raise the nap. These are the directions given by an expert presser.

How to Render Paper Fireproof.

To make paper fireproof, whether written, printed, painted or stamped, as for hangings, dip it in strong alum water—a saturated solution—and dry thoroughly. Test after the first dipping. If it burns dip and dry again. Neither color nor quality will be in the least affected—on the contrary, rather improved. Title deeds and insurance policies can be protected in this way.

How to Hang Pictures.

Pictures should be hung as nearly flat against the wall as is possible and not tipped forward at various angles with the wall. It is best to use two hooks, so that two vertical pieces of wire will appear instead of the triangular one, which appears when but one hook is used. The effect is more artistic and restful in a room where the pictures are hung vertically.

A frosty gloom was over the city of Anlston, moon and stars hidden by a cloudy sky, from which a light snow the first of the season, was sifting down. The streets were asleep. Only occasional belated pedestrians were to be seen in the chilly air. These saw a man, his face muffled from the snowflakes, pass hurriedly toward the fountained square, from whose steeple 2 o'clock was just striking. The wayfarer skirted the square, keeping in cover of the buildings as though avoiding chance observation, till he stood on the pavement of a Gothic chapel fronting the open space.

On the night of his flight from Smoky Mountain, Hugh had ridden hard till dawn, abandoning the horse to find its way back as best it might. He had slept through the next day. For two days after his arrival he had hung about outside the town in a fever of impatience, for, though he had readily ascertained that the premises were unoccupied, the first night he had been frightened away by the too zealous scrutiny of a policeman, and on the next he had been unable to force the door. That morning he had secured a skeleton key, and now the weather was propitious for his purpose.

After a moment's reconnoitering he sculed the frost fretted iron palings and gained the shelter of the porch. He tried the key anxiously. To his relief, it fitted. Another minute and he stood in the study, the door locked behind him, his veins bealing with excitement.

Crouching down before the safe, he took from his pocket the paper upon which was written the combination.

The match scorched his fingers, and he lighted another and began to turn

"You speak as if you were sorry for me."

the knob. The lock bore both figures and letters in concentric rings, and he saw that the seven figures Harry had written formed a word. Hugh dropped the match with a smothered exclamation, for the word was Jessica! So Harry really had loved her in the old days! He swung the massive door wide and took out the canvas bag with the thousand dollars. With this and the ruby ring—it must easily be worth as much again—he could put the round world between himself and capture.

He closed the safe and with the bag of coin in his hand groped his way to the door of the chapel. It was less dark there, for the snow was making a white night outside, and the stained glass cast a wan glimmer across the aisles. He greatly needed sleep, and tonight in the open that was out of the question. He could gain several hours' rest where he was and still get away before daybreak. He drew together the altar cushions and lay down, the canvas bag beside him, but he was cold, and at length he rose and went into the vestry for a surplice. He wrapped this about him and, lighting a cigarette, lay down again. He was very tired, and in a few minutes he was sleeping heavily.

The last half consumed cigarette dropped from his relaxing fingers to the cushion, where it made a smoldering nest of fire. A tiny tongue of flame caught the edge of a wall hanging, ran up to the dry oaken rafters and speedily ignited them. In fifteen minutes the interior of the chapel was a mass of flame, and Hugh woke gasping and bewildered.

With a cry of alarm he sprang to his feet, seized the bag of coin and ran to the door of the study. In his haste he stumbled against it, and the dead lock snapped to. He was a prisoner now, for he had left the skeleton key in the inside of the outer door. Clutching his treasure, he ran to the main entrance. It was fast. He tried the smaller windows. Iron bars were set across them.

He made shift to wrap the surplice about his mouth against the stifling smoke and fiery vapors. The bag dropped from his hand, and the gold rolled about the floor. He stooped and clutched a handful of the coins and crammed them into his pocket. Was he to die, after all, like this, caught like a rat in a trap?

Uttering a hoarse cry, with the strength of despair, Hugh wrenched a pew from the floor and made of it a ladder to reach the rose window. Mounting this, he beat frantically with his fist upon the painted glass. The crystal shivered beneath the blows, and clinging to the iron supports, his beard burned to the skin, he set his face to the aperture and drew a gulping breath of the sweet, cold air. In his agony, with that fiery hell opening beneath him, he could see the massed people watching from the safety that was so near.

"Look! Look!" The sudden cry went up, and a thrill of awe ran through the crowd. The glass Hugh had shattered had formed the face of the penitent thief in the window of the end in the gulch when he had produced the scrap of paper which was the crux of the case. He declared he had found Moreau dying; that the latter had traced with his own hand the accusation which fastened the crime upon Hugh Stires.

In his cross examination Fehler fought gamely to lighten the weight of the evidence. All rested, he said, upon a single scrap of paper, a fragment of handwriting in no way difficult of imitation, and this in turn upon the allegation of a thief, struck down in an act of crime, whose word in an ordinary case of fact would not be worth a farthing. No motive had been alleged for the killing of Moreau by the prisoner, but Prendergast had had motive enough in his accusation. It had been open knowledge that he hated Hugh Stires, and his own character made it evident that he would not have scrupled to fasten a murder upon him.

But as Fehler studied the twelve grave faces in the jury box, who in the last analysis were all that counted, he shared his client's hopelessness. Judgment and experience told him how futile were all theories in the face of that inarticulate but damning witness that Prendergast had left behind him. So the afternoon dragged through, a day for the state.

As she passed Harry she bent and laid one in his hand.

Sunset came early at that season. Dark fell, and the electric bulbs made their mimic day, but no one left the room. The outcome seemed a foregone conclusion. The jurymen no longer gazed at the prisoner, and when they looked at one another it was with grim understanding. As the last witness for the state stepped down and the prosecutor rested the judge glanced at the clock.

"There is a bare half hour," he said tentatively. "Perhaps the defense would prefer not to open testimony till tomorrow."

Fehler had risen. He saw his opportunity—to bring out sharply a contrasting point in the prisoner's favor, the one circumstance, considered apart, pointing toward innocence rather than guilt; to leave this for the jury to take with them, to offset by its effect the weight of the evidence that had been given.

"I will proceed, if your honor pleases," he said and amid a rustle of surprise and interest called Jessica to the stand.

As she went forward to the witness chair she put back the shielding veil, and her face, pale as bramble bloom under her red bronzed hair, made an appealing picture. A cluster of white carnations was pinned to her coat, and as she passed Harry she bent and laid one in his hand. The slight act, not lost upon the spectators, called forth a sibilant flutter of sympathy, for it wore no touch of designed effect. Its impulse was as pure and unmistakable as its meaning.

"That man's name," he blazed, "is not Hugh Stires."

Harry had started uncontrollably as she rose, for he had had no inkling of the lawyer's intention, and a flush darkened his cheek at the cool touch of the flower. But this faded to a settled pallor as under Fehler's grave questioning she told in a voice as clear as a child's, yet with a woman's emotion struggling through it, the story of her disregarded warning. While she spoke pain and shame traveled through his every vein, for, though technically she had not brought herself into the perplexing purview of the law, she was laying bare the secret of her own heart, which now he would have covered at any cost.

"That is all, your honor," said Fehler when Jessica had finished her story.

"Do you wish to cross examine?" asked the judge perfunctorily.

The prosecutor looked at her an instant. He saw the faintness in her eyes, the twitching of the gloved hand on the rail. "By no means," he said courteously and turned to his papers.

At the same moment as Jessica stepped into the open aisle the trouble chance treated the spellbound audience to a novel sensation. Every electric light suddenly went out, and darkness swooped upon the town and the courtroom. Hubbub arose—people stood up in their places.

The judge's gavel pounded viciously, and his stentorian voice bellowed for order.

"Keep your seats, everybody!" he commanded. "Mr. Clerk, get some candles. This court is not yet adjourned."

Chapter 27

IN communities such as Smoky Mountain the law moves with fateful rapidity. Harry had been formally arraigned the second morning after his self surrender and had pleaded not guilty. The grand jury was in session—indeed, had about finished its labors—and there had been no reason for delay. All necessary witnesses for the state were on the ground, and Fehler for his part had no others to summon. So that when Dr. Brent one keen forenoon swung himself off a Pullman at the station, returning from his ten days' absence, he found the town thrilling with the excitement of the first day of the trial. Before he left the station he had learned of Prendergast's death and accusation and knew that Tom Fehler had come to the prisoner's defense. Dr. Brent had taken no stock in the young lawyer's view of Hugh Stires.

He betook himself to the filled courtroom. The court had opened two hours before and half the jury had been selected. His attention was given first to the bench where the prisoner sat and second to a chair close to the railing beside Mrs. Halloran's, where a girl's face glimmered palely under a light veil.

Toward this chair the hundreds of eyes in the room that morning had often turned. Since the day Mrs. Halloran had surprised Jessica at work upon the rock statue she had kept her counsel; but, as the physician had conjectured, the monument had been stumbled upon and had drawn curious visitors. Thus the name on the grave had become common property and the coincidence had been chattered of. That Jessica had chiseled the statue was not doubted. She had bought the tools in town, and old Paddy Wise, the blacksmith, had sharpened them for her. The story Prendergast had told in the general store, too, had not been forgotten, and the aid she had given the fever stricken man had acquired a new significance in face of the knowledge that she had more than once been admitted to the jail with Fehler. From the moment of the opening of the trial Jessica had divided interest with the prisoner.

Circumstantially speaking, the evidence was flawless. Dr. Moreau, while little known and less liked, had figured in the town as a promoter and an inventor of "slick" stock schemes. He had come there with Hugh Stires from Sacramento, where they had had a business partnership of short duration. There had been bad blood between them then, as the latter had once admitted. The prisoner had preempted the claim on Smoky mountain in an abortive "boom" which Moreau had engineered, and over whose proceeds the pair, it was believed, had fallen out. He had then, to use the attorney's phrase, "swapped the devil for the witch" and had taken up with Prendergast, who by the manner of his talking off had finally instilled a jail record in another state. Soon after this break Hugh Stires had vanished. On the day following his last appearance in the town the body of Moreau had been found on the Little Paymaster claim shot by a cowardly bullet through the back, a fact which precluded the possibility that the deed had been done in self defense. There was evidence that he had died a painful and lingering death. Suspicion had naturally pointed to the vanished man, and this suspicion had grown until, after some months' absence, he had returned, alleging that he had lost his memory of the past, to resume his life in the cabin on the mountain and his partnership with the thief Prendergast. The two had finally quarreled, and Prendergast had moved to town.

Subsequent to this the latter had been heard to make dark insinuations, unnoted at the time, but since grown significance, hinting at criminal knowledge of the dead man. The clerk of the court, Orrell Prendergast's distant the sessions by the high school chorus, the ladies quartette, the normal class and others, who received a vote of thanks, as did the people of East Jordan for their splendid hospitality.

Superintendents Woodley, Bell and Fuller together with Oral Missenar, and W. F. Hashaw were appointed as a committee on resolutions and presented the following which were unanimously adopted by the association:

Resolved—(1st) That it is the sentiment of this association that the passage of a Township Unit System for the lower peninsula of Michigan would promote the educational interests of our state especially since the township high school would be the natural outgrowth of such a law.

12nd) That the passage of a Uniform Text Book law would not serve the best educational interest of our state.

(3rd) That the present operative Truancy law has done much to raise the standard of excellence in the schools of our county.

THEATRICAL

The Senior Play

The senior play to be put on at the Charlevoix Theater on Friday, April 2, will be truly worthy of your patronage.

The class will stage Esmeralda, a comedy drama in four acts, written by the author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy," which had a run of three hundred and fifty nights at the Madison Square Theater, New York.

After the play, a farce entitled "The Sleeping Car" will be given. Of this farce Superintendent Woodley after reading it, said that it was the cleverest farce he had ever read.

Remember,—Charlevoix Theater April 2.

Mass Meeting

A Mass meeting of those in favor of prohibiting the liquor traffic in Charlevoix county will be held in the Majestic theater Sunday afternoon at three o'clock. Judge Harris, secretary of the county committee will be present. The meeting is intended for those in favor of it and there will be no formal set addresses. All who favor this movement without regard to party or other affiliations we invite to be present and take part.

DR. JOHN MERRITTE DRIVER

The Closing Number of the Lecture Course March 26

The lecture course will close Friday evening, March 26, with a lecture by Dr. Driver, of Chicago. It hardly seems necessary to say more than that this is the Dr. Driver who lectured here two years ago. Dr. Driver was placed on the present course because he pleased the people so well when he was here. The people pronounced his lecture the most satisfactory of any lecture that has ever been given in this city. Those who failed to hear him were very sorry when they realized the great enthusiasm with which he was received. Another opportunity to hear him is now given the people of Charlevoix and there will be a rush this time sure. Reserve seat sale will open at the Ivy drug store Wednesday evening, March 24, at 7 o'clock.

Cure of Lambs.

An experienced breeder says that in the case of twins it is well to place them with the mother in a small, separate pen for a day or two in order that they may become acquainted and to avoid the danger of one of the lambs straying away, which may cause trouble. When lambs are born weakly more care is required, and unless the shepherd is with them to see that they are suckled soon after birth they are liable to become chilled and die. If the lamb is too weak to stand up and suck it should be held up and some milk milked into its mouth, when it will soon take the teat and help itself, or the ewe may be gently laid upon her side and the lamb brought to the teat on its knees or side and helped as above indicated.

Barley For Stock Food.

Barley as a food for live stock is much commoner in European countries than it is in the United States. In this country it is confined more largely to states of the Pacific slope. Byproducts left from the breweries are usually good as stock feed. Barley is a crop that can be raised in a great many different climates and is surer of maturing a crop than some other of the small grains.

There is more catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials.

The Question of Local Option

This space will be devoted to the discussion of the question of local option. Only matter which is furnished us by regular representatives of each faction will be used as we see fit. The COURIER is not responsible for anything appearing under this head, nor does it in any way represent the policy of this paper.

A detailed statement of the minimum expense of operating the thirteen saloons in Boyne City, for one year and of the public revennes derived therefrom.

State license, $500, each	$ 6,500
Government license, $25, each	325
Rents, $500, per year each	6,500
Help, two men to each saloon, $500, per year each	13,000
Heat and lights	2,340
Total of minimum expense	$28,665
Estimated cost of stock based on 100 per cent profit	28,665
Total amount of sales necessary for expense	$57,330

The above is an average of $4,410 per each saloon.

Assuming that the expense of the other saloons in the county are approximately the same, then

East Jordan's nine saloons cost	$39,690
Charlevoix's five saloons cost	22,050
Boyne Fall's four saloons cost	17,640
St. James' two saloons cost	8,820
Making a total cost, for the county of	$145,530

In other words the people of Charlevoix county contribute each year to maintain the saloons of the county $145,530, without making a dollar for the saloon keeper or paying any interest on his investment, and it is fair to assume they are making more money than they could at any other business or why is their anxiety to continue the business.

Now, what do we get for this? The advocates of the liquor interests tell us, that we get the license money. This is what we get.

Boyne City gets $3,250 and spends for it	$57,330
East Jordan gets $2,250 and spends for it	39,690
Charlevoix gets $1,250 and spends for it	22,050
Boyne Falls gets $1,000 and spends for it	17,640
St. James gets $500 and spends for it	8,820

There should be added to the public revennes above listed the sum of $8,350 received by the county treasurer for the general fund of the county, making a total public revenue of $16,500 less a collection fee of $165.

To get this the people of the county are spending at least $145,530 for that which not enriches, but makes them poor indeed.

Voters Take Notice

We have been informed, on reliable authority, that the campaign managers of the saloon interests are trying to make arrangement with all the livery barns in the county to hire all the teams on election day so it will be impossible for any person, who is in favor of local option, to secure a rig to get the voters out. If you are in favor of local option and desire to cast your ballot against this method resorted to by the saloon men, kindly make an effort to get out on election, and also see that your friends are there even though they are compelled to walk. Local option interests are mainly supported by the poorer class; and the saloon men by this method are using the same money that they have taken from the working class and investing it in tieing up the livery rigs in hopes that you would be unable to cast your ballot against them. The scheme itself is devilish and it is an admission on their part of the weakness of their cause. Kindly tell your neighbor about this saloon scheme.

WAS PATIENT SUFFERER

Mrs. J. A. Hawkins Dies Friday After Long Illness.

Had Been a Charlevoix Resident For Twenty-Five Years.

Again it becomes the sad duty of the COURIER to record the death of one of our most highly esteemed pioneer residents, Mrs. J. A. Hawkins, who died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. F. H. Wilkinson, Friday, March 12, after a long illness of anaemia.

Hannah White was born in Nottinghamshire, England, in 1842, coming with her parents, to this country two years later, where they settled in Kent county, this state. May 1, 1866, she was married at Bowne Michigan, to J. A. Hawkins, going immediately to Hastings, where, with the exception of a short time in Grand Rapids, they lived until 1882, when they moved to Charlevoix, living here ever since, except three years which were spent in Chicago.

Mrs. Hawkins became a member of the Methodist church at Hastings, in 1867, joining the Charlevoix church, by letter, upon her removal to this city, and always took an active part in the church work of the different societies who will sadly miss her advice and counsel.

She leaves, besides her husband one daughter, Edith, wife of Dr. F. H. Wilkinson, four sisters, Mrs. Harriet Whitney of Caledonia, Mrs. Mary Stone of Alto, Mrs. Anna Jones of Hastings and Mrs. Elizabeth Trunx of Keokuk Iowa, all of whom were present at the funeral but Mrs. Trunx.

The funeral was held Monday forenoon from the house Rev. Dr. Wright officiating, the O. E. S., of which Mrs. Hawkins had long been a member, attending in a body. Burial took place at Brookside.

Neighborhood Notes

A card playing contest lasting twenty years has come to an end at Mancelona. John W. Wallace, seventy-six years old, is the winner, having defeated D. W. Lazelle, seventy-eight years old, in ten consecutive games.

Twenty years ago the men were the veteran pedro players of the village. Each prided himself on his ability to play the game. Whenever the two men were together they were warm rivals and people gathered often to watch them fight over the card table. The rivalry became so intense that each was claiming the village championship.

One evening twenty years ago they were at a social affair in the village when Lazelle challenged Wallace and was accepted. The men agreed that the winner must win ten consecutive games before the title was his.

Two nights after the rules of the contest had been arranged the men started. They played every night except Sunday week after week and year after year and neither had proved himself the better player until now.

Frank Hosmer, know as the "ginseng king" of northern Michigan, has a new garden at his farm home at Pleasant Grove. He set it out last fall and this spring will put "shading" on the posts scattered through the yard. It required 270,000 ginseng seeds to plant this new garden, valued at from $2 per 1,000 up.

Carl E. Schmidt, of Detroit, displayed before the senate committees on forestry interests Thursday afternoon a resume of the report of Messrs. Bradfield and Wynne, United States forestry experts, who spent several weeks investigating the effects of last fall's forest fires in northern Michigan.

The experts have figured out that the exact loss wrought by the fires in dollars and cents amounts to $28,502,607.50. This includes timber destroyed, timber lowered in grade, pulp wood, logs and property destroyed and money spent in fighting the fires.

The total area burned over was 7,000,000 acres, of which 2,061,000 was virgin timber and 1,890,000 cut-over land.

The reports of the experts says further that there was additional loss that cannot be estimated, because lumber companies were compelled to cut reserve timber. Still more important, says the report, was the devastation of young trees. They were burned off of 3,000,000 acres. To replace them would entail an expense of $5 an acre, or an aggregate of $15,000,000. The experts also call attention to the burning of the humus and vegetable matter, thus destroying the richness and productive ability of the soil completely. In the opinion of the experts this loss more than offsets the advantage from clearing the lands.

Dr. Abbott, of Lake City, commenced a suit for $10,500 damages against Orville Dennis, publisher of the Missaukee Republican at Lake City for slander. The story of the suit is to the effect that when local option was agitated in that county Dr. Abbott espoused the "dry" cause, but that later he purchased a business at Mooretown and sold liquor which was dispensed by one other than a registered pharmacist. For the alleged offenses, Editor Dennis through his paper called Dr. Abbott a hypocrite and some other names, to which Dr. Abbott took exception. Dennis' friends claim all he will have to do will be to prove that Dr. Abbott did not have a registered pharmacist in his employ at the time in question.

The government at Washington figures that rural mail delivery is worth $117 per year to every farmer who gets mail on such a route. The process of logic by which this figure is reached is as follows: At a valuation of $1 per day for a farmer's time and team, the time consumed by a farmer coming to town for his mail, and using half a day for that purpose, and spending on each trip 25 cents for trifles, represents a loss of $2.25 each trip, or an annual loss of $117.

THE DOCTOR'S QUESTION

Advice Against the Use of Harsh Purgatives and Physics

A doctor's first question when consulted by a patient is, "are your bowels regular?" He knows that ninety-eight per cent of illness is attended with inactive bowels and torpid liver. This condition poisons the system with noxious gases and waste matter which naturally accumulates and which must be removed through the bowels before health can be restored.

Salts, ordinary pills and cathartics may be truly likened to dynamite. Through their harsh, irritating action they force a passage through the bowels, causing pain and damage to the delicate intestinal structure which weakens the whole system, and at best only produces temporary relief. The repeated use of such treatments cause chronic irritation of the stomach and bowels, hardens their tissues, deadens their nerves, stiffens their muscles and generally brings about an injurious habit which sometimes has fatal results.

We have a positive, pleasant and safe remedy for constipation and bowel disorders in general. We are so certain of its great curative value that we promise to return the purchaser's money in every case when it fails to produce entire satisfaction. This remedy is called Rexall Orderlies. We urge you to try them at our entire risk.

Rexall Orderlies are very pleasant to take, they act quietly and have a soothing, strengthening, healing influence on the entire intestinal tract. They do not purge, gripe, cause nausea, flatulence, excessive looseness, diarrhoea or other annoying effect, and they may be taken at any time without any inconvenience.

Rexall Orderlies overcome the drugging habit and cure constipation and all similar ailments, whether acute or chronic. They are especially good for children, weak persons or old folks. Price 36 tablets, 25c, and 12 tablets 10c. Ivy Drug store, A. H. Fleischer, proprietor.

"Which Is For Memory."

By MARION TRAVERS.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press

A man and a maid stood on the porch of a little New England farmhouse. The man had barely passed his majority, and the years of the girl numbered less than his by three. The man was going hundreds of miles to the westward, there to find a competence.

When he had succeeded the girl was to come to him for the rest of the happy years. In his hands were two sprigs of rosemary, one of which he gave to the maid.

"It's for remembrance, Betty. Not that we will either of us need it, dear, but I shall carry it with me wherever I go."

"You know you'll always be in my thoughts, Tom. I'll put it under my pillow at night that I may dream of you and wear it next my heart in waking hours that every beat may be for you. Goodby, Tom, and God bless you and send you back to me." And the maid turned her lips upward for her lover's kiss.

"Goodby, Betty! It won't be for long, and then we will be together for the rest of our lives." And he gave her one last caress before he turned and started down the graveled path bound on the outfall.

Betty had been motherless since her sixth year, and at the close of a winter's day the soul of her father left its gaunt frame, and she was alone.

Tom wrote a letter full of tender consolation, and it was on the absent sweetheart she leaned during the days and nights of her affliction.

Betty's father had been frugal and shrewd, and there was enough to provide for the remainder of her days.

She had no relatives in the home of her father, and when legal matters were finally adjusted she left for a big western city to live with an aunt while she was waiting for Tom. It was then the first blow fell.

No letter came from her sweetheart in the far west. At first she did not worry, for he had written that he was going on a long prospecting trip and might be weeks, even months, from civilization.

But when spring came and in turn gave way to summer, and summer fled before the chilling blasts of autumn, and the weeks dragged drearily by until a year had passed, Betty abandoned hope.

She wrote to the authorities of the frontier town where he usually outfitted, but they could tell her nothing. Tom had left in April. He had not returned. They knew nothing of his fate.

In the passing of the years her grief was softened, but the agony of her loss was there, locked with her love in the innermost recesses of her heart. Suitors came, but were sent away, not hurt, but firmly, gently denied. Her cousins married, little ones came to bless them, and to all she was Aunt Betty.

There was another Betty now, a pretty, graceful maid of seventeen, joying in her first glimpses of social life and rapturously happy, because she was just living. They were great cronies, these two Bettys, and it was often remarked that their resemblance extended away and beyond the name.

"Aunt Betty, why didn't you marry?" asked the little Betty one afternoon when the two were having a long, confidential chat.

Then faded old letters were brought out and read, the dimmed thatype of a country boy with a fine featured face was cried over and the withered sprig of rosemary lifted gently from the jewel case, where it had reposed so many years in state.

"And the rosemary, auntie?" queried little Betty.

"Rosemary is for remembrance, dearie. We each had a sprig and were to keep it always, so that whenever we saw it the other's face would appear in our dreams," said auntie.

"And do you dream of him yet?" pursued the younger.

"Bless you, Betty, I'll always dream of him, and I pray now that after death here I may see him."

"And so that's the reason you didn't let Dr. Thornton and the others marry you when they asked?"

"Betty, how did you know?"

"Oh, I heard mamma talking about it. But I won't tell," she promised penitently. "I love it! Lovely, too, Betty. It's perfect. I should love so long and so tight when you knew he's dead. Would he care, do you think, if you—if you—knew—he'd—?"

"He knew I never would," said the older Betty slightly.

After that the little girl had to go away to school. She was sent to a distant city to be taught in a manner of things embraced in that word "finished."

To her romantic soul came many experiences, many temptations to surrender to what she thought was love, but always she measured the depths of her emotions by Aunt Betty's loyalty of a score of years.

"Would I love him like that?" she would ask of herself, and always the suitor failed in the test.

One afternoon she went to a matinee at a downtown theater. As she was leaving the playhouse she was confronted by a stalwart man, whose agitation was greater than her own.

"Betty Randall!" he all but shouted in his excitement.

"Annie!" gasped Betty.

"Are you Betty Randall?" queried the stranger. "Of course not. You're just a child, and Betty would have been more than twice your age if she were alive," and he apologized for his rudeness as he turned to go.

It flashed over Betty in an instant. Could it be true? She decided to risk it.

"Tom!" she called softly.

The man wheeled at the word and stood staring at the girl.

"Are you Tom Wilson?" she asked. "And did you leave over twenty years ago to go out west, and"— she continued.

"Yes, yes! Why—how—who are you?" he demanded.

"Betty Randall is my aunt," said Betty, "and she has your sprig of rosemary."

"Here's mine!" he cried, and he plunged into his pocket and brought forth a worn wallet.

That night Mr. Wilson had a long talk with Betty at the school. She arranged to go home the next morning, and Tom was to follow the day after. He explained how he had been sick for a year from exposure while lost in the mountains, how he wrote to the old address, but got no reply.

He had gone back to the New Hampshire town, but no one could give him Betty's address. So, with fortune beyond his boyhood dreams, he had rambled up and down the world, hoping, hunting and miserable.

"Aunt Betty," said little Betty two days later, "suppose Tom is alive. Suppose he didn't die, but couldn't find out where you were. Wouldn't that be fine?" And her eyes danced with what the elder took to be girlish enthusiasm for a romance so near to her.

There was a knock at the door, and a maid entered with a card tray.

"There's a gentleman downstairs to see you, Miss Randall. He wouldn't give me his card, but said you'd understand by this." And she held out the tray so that there was disclosed thereon a sprig of rosemary.

"Betty, it's true! He's alive! It's Tom!" And the speed with which she descended played havoc with orthodox ideas of dignity. She fell rather than ran into the sitting room, there to be clasped in two arms, while a man's voice came softly to her:

"At last! Thank God, at last!"

It Had Its Limitations.

"Madam," said the young man who had called at the door, "I have the pleasure of introducing to you our new automatic housecleaning machine, a simple little thing which does the whole work of housecleaning, leaving you merely the general supervision."

"Does it do all, eh?" demanded the woman of the house. "Will it wash the outside of the upstairs windows?"

"Why, no, madam, but"—

"Will it take down, wash, stretch to dry, iron and hang up the parlor curtains?"

"Well, of course, this machine"—

"Will it paint the kitchen and make my daughter help with the dishes?"

"Oh, madam, this machine"—

"Will it wash the winter bedding and put it away, lay down the furs with moth balls, sew on buttons, set three meals a day and pacify the household?"

"No, madam. You have misunderstood the limitations of my machine."

"Limitations! It will be a long time before any man will get up a machine to do all a woman has to do in her house."

The agent silently faded away.

His Turn For Luxury.

It was one of those palpably cold ham and pickle nuts, but the motor wouldn't go, so Jones and Jenkins had to make the best of a bad smash and put up there.

"Accommodation, gentlemen? Certainly, gentlemen!" oozed the obsequious landlord. "Beautiful large feather bed, plenty of room for the two of you and big enough for three. This way, gentlemen!"

They went, they saw, they grumbled. It certainly wasn't much of a feather bed. But they agreed to take it and, being fatigued, retired early.

In a few minutes Jones was sound asleep, but try as he might, Jenkins could not "drop off."

At 2 in the morning Jones was awakened by a violent nudge in the solar plexus.

"What's the matter?" he growled.

"Get up!" was the reply. "It's half time!"

"Half time? What are you talking about? This isn't a cup tie!"

"No, but it's my turn to sleep on that feather!"—London Answers.

As the pall of darkness fell upon the courtroom it brought to Jessica a sense of premonition as though the incident prefigured the gloomy end. She turned sick and stumbled down the aisle, feeling that she must reach the outer air.

In the room Jessica had left the turmoil was simmering down. Here and there a match was struck and showed a circle of brightness. The glimmer of one of them lit the countenance of a man who had brushed her sleeve as he entered. It was Hallelujah Jones.

"Wait, wait!" he cried. "I have evidence to give!" He pointed excitedly toward Harry. "This man is not what you think. He is not"—

The judge's gavel thumped upon the wood. "How dare you," he vociferated, "break in upon the deliberations of this court? I fine you $20 for contempt."

Felder had leaped to his feet. What could this man know? He took a bill from his pocket and clapped it down on the clerk's desk.

"I beg to purge him of contempt," he said, "and call him as a witness."

Hallelujah Jones snatched the Bible from the clerk's hands and kissed it. Knowledge was burning his tongue. The jury were leaning forward in their seats.

"Have you ever seen the prisoner before?" asked Felder.

"Yes."

"When?"

"When he was a minister of the gospel."

Felder stared. The judge frowned. The jury looked at one another, and a laugh ran round the hushed room.

The merriment kindled the evangelist's distempered passion. Sudden anger flamed in him. He leaned forward and shook his hand vehemently at the table where Harry sat, his face as colorless as the flower he wore.

"That man's name," he blazed, "is not Hugh Stires. It is a cloak he has chosen to cover his shame. He is the Rev. Henry Sanderson of Aniston."

* * * * * * * *

Harry's pulses had leaped with excitement when the street preacher's first exclamation startled the courtroom; now they were beating as though they must burst. Through the stir about him he heard the crisp voice of the district attorney:

"I ask your honor's permission before this extraordinary witness is examined further," he said caustically, "to read an item printed here which has a bearing upon the testimony." He held to his hand a newspaper which earlier in the afternoon, with cynical disregard of Felder's tactics, he had been casually perusing.

"Read it, sir."

Holding the newspaper to a candle, the lawyer read in an even voice, prefacing his reading with the journal's name and date:

This city, which was aroused in the night by the burning of St. James' chapel, will be greatly shocked to learn that its rector, the Rev. Henry Sanderson, who has been for some months on a prolonged vacation, was in the building at the time and now lies at the city hospital, suffering from injuries from which it is rumored there is grave doubt of his recovery.

In the titter that rippled the courtroom Harry felt his heart bound and swell. Under the succinct statement he clearly discerned the fact. He saw the pitfall into which Hugh had fallen—the trap into which he himself had sent him on that fatal errand with the ruby ring on his finger. "Grave doubt of his recovery!" A surge of relief swept over him to his finger tips. He would be free to go back—to be himself again, to be Jessica's—if Hugh died. The reading voice drummed in his ears:

The facts have not as yet been ascertained, but it seems clear that the popular young minister returned to town unexpectedly last night and was asleep in his study when the fire started. His presence in the building was unguessed until too late, and it was by little short of a miracle that he was brought out alive.

As we go to press we learn that Mr. Sanderson's condition is much more hopeful than was at first reported.

Harry's heart contracted as if a giant hand had clutched it. His elation fell like a rotten tree girdled at the roots. If Hugh did not die! He chilled as though in a spray of liquid air. Hugh's escape—the chance his conscience had given him—was cut off.

The judge reached for the newspaper the lawyer held, ran his eye over it and brought his gavel down with an angry snort.

"Take him away," he said. "His testimony is ordered stricken from the records. The fine is remitted, Mr. Felder. We can't make you responsible for lunatics. The court stands adjourned."

Felder had been among the last to leave the courtroom. He was discomfited and angry. At the door of the courthouse Dr. Brent slipped an arm through his.

"Too bad, Tom," he said sympathizingly. "I don't think you quite deserved it."

Felder paced a moment without speaking. "I need evidence," he said then; "anything that may help. I made a mistake. You heard all the testimony?"

The other nodded.

"What did you think of it?"

"What could any one think? I give all credit to your motive, Tom, but it's a pity you're mixed up in it."

"Why?"

"Because, if there's anything in human evidence, he's a thoroughly worthless reprobate. He lay for Morenu and murdered him in cold blood, and he ought to swing."

"The casual view," said the lawyer gloomily. "Just what I should have said myself—if this had happened a month ago."

His friend looked at him with an amused expression. "I begin to think he must be a remarkable man!" he said. "Is it possible he has really convinced you that he isn't guilty?"

Felder turned upon the doctor sqnarely. "Yes," he returned bluntly. "He has. Whatever I may have believed when I took this case, I have come to the conclusion—against all my professional instincts, mind you—that he never killed Morenu. I believe he's as innocent as either you or I!"

"He has as good as admitted to Miss Holme that he knows who did it."

"Come, come! Putting his neck into the noose for mere Quixotic feeling? And who, pray, in this God forsaken town, should he be sacrificing himself for?" the doctor asked satirically.

"That's the rub," said the lawyer. "Nobody. Yet I hang by my proposition."

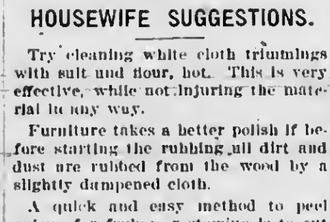
"Well, he'll hang by something less tenuous, I'm afraid. But it won't be your fault. The crazy evangelist was only an incident. He merely served to jolt us back to the normal. By the way, did you hear him sputter after he got out?"

"No."

"You remember the story he told the other night of the minister who was caught gambling on his own communion table? Well, Hugh Stires is not only the Reverend Henry Something-or-other, but he is that man too! The crack brained old idiot would have told the tale all over again only the crowd hustled him. There he is now," he said suddenly as a light sprang up and voices broke out on the opposite corner. "The gang is standing by. I see your friend Tanney Medina," he added, with a grim enjoyment. "I doubt if there are many converts tonight."

Even as he spoke there came a shout of laughter and warning. The spectators scattered in all directions, and a stream of water from a well directed hose deluged the itinerant and his music box.

Ten minutes later the street preacher, drenched and furious, was trundling his melodeon toward Funeral Hollow, on his way to the coast.



Deluged the Itinerant.

LINEN DRAPERIES.

Inside Curtains of This Material Are Very Smart.

For inside curtains heavy linen, either natural linen color, in white or colors, is very popular. They are selected, of course, in accordance with the fittings of the room and are trimmed either with applique of linen in contrasting colors, with braid or embroidery in heavy linen thread. Chintz hangings are also very popular, and chintz and cretonne are now shown in a more remarkable variety of colors and designs than ever before. There is quite a fad at the moment for the blue and white or the red and white chintz hangings for use, of course, in rooms suitably decorated. The walls of a room, for instance, may be in pale gray or white and gray when blue and white, or red and white chintz will be used for hangings and upholstery. These chintzes are not quite so striking as they sound, the red chintz, in fact, being quite mild in effect. The color is a light and rather dull red, and the patterns show a great deal of white. For some bedrooms, such, for instance, as have a rather chilly aspect, these chintzes are admirable. They seem more suitable for men's rooms than the flowered chintzes in pink and green, lavender and yellow, which are so charming.

HOUSEWIFE SUGGESTIONS.

Try cleaning white cloth trimmings with salt and flour, hot. This is very effective, while not injuring the material in any way.

Furniture takes a better polish if before starting the rubbing all dirt and dust are rubbed from the wood by a slightly dampened cloth.

A quick and easy method to peel onions for frying or stewing is to cut off the top and bottom of the onion, quarter it, and the outside skin is easily removed.

When starching holland pinafores, if a little tea is put into the starch used they will keep their color instead of getting that faded appearance we all know so well.

If a small quantity of cream turns sour in the icebox, do not throw it out, but with a fork beat it a few minutes, and a tiny pat of fresh butter and a little glass of buttermilk will be the reward.

To clean kid shoes put in a saucer a half ounce of strong ammonia, dip in a clean flannel and rub it on castile soap. Then rub the shoes with this, changing the flannel when it becomes soiled.

A cake which has been removed from the oven should be placed on a wire stand on the stove and the steam allowed to thoroughly escape from it, so as to obviate any chance of its becoming heavy.

WHAT THE COLD DOES.

Effects of Low Temperatures on Metals and Water.

Now that the cold weather is here everything is getting smaller. The iron bridge you walk over isn't as big as it was last Fourth of July, and the knife that you sharpen your pencil with has shrunk, though so slightly that you would need a microscope to see the difference. If you live near a big iron bridge you can find the place that the builders have allowed for this shrinkage. It is an arrangement of overlapping iron plates. If the bridge were made solid it would break or get out of shape as the seasons changed.

You can see a metal expand quite quickly if you like by holding your finger over the bulb of a thermometer. Mercury, or quicksilver, expands and contracts more than other liquids, and that is why we use it in thermometers. Besides, it does not freeze unless it is very, very cold.

The strange thing about water is that as it gets colder it contracts like most things, but as soon as it freezes it expands again. If you fill a tumbler of water full to the very brim and set it out to freeze you will find that when it has frozen solid the ice extends above the rim of the glass. Only if you make this experiment use an old tumbler or glass, for it may possibly crack.

It is a very good thing that water does expand when it freezes, for that makes it light, so that it floats. If it were heavy and sank, our lakes and streams would get frozen solid in winter, and it would take a long series of warm summer days to melt them again, and all the fish would be killed. —Philadelphia Record.

DUCK UNDER THE WATER.

An Old English Game That Is Full of Life and Motion.

In playing this game each child chooses a partner and they form in couples, standing one pair before another till a long line is made. Each couple holds a handkerchief between them as high as they can, to form an arch. The couple at the foot of the line run through the arch, stopping just beyond the last couple standing at the head. There they stand still and hold up their handkerchief, thus forming another arch. This is repeated by every couple left at the foot in succession, so that there are always the same number of arches. The line may be straight or curved or in a circle, according to fancy or the space in which the game is played.

This game is very pretty, with its quick motions and changing arches. It is an English game, played in Northamptonshire. Formerly in the northern part of the county even married women played it on May day under the May garland which was hung from chimney to chimney across the village street.

A Pretty Superstition.

Among the superstitions of the Seneca Indians is or was a beautiful one connected with the death of a maiden. When this occurred, they imprisoned a young bird and kept it so until it began to try its powers of song, and then, loading it with caresses and messages, they set it free over her grave in the belief that it would not fold its wings or close its eyes until it had flown to the spirit land and delivered its burden of affection to the loved one.

A Minute at Panama.

Make Steak Tender.

Steak that is not porterhouse can be improved by treating it as the French chefs prepare their steaks to make them tender. Turn half a dozen times at intervals; then the meat is ready to broil.

Wall Street "Death Scares."

"While the tremendous break in the market which followed the death of Governor Flower was still fresh in public memory, the 'death scare' was a favorite device of the bears in Wall street," said an old broker. "But they met their Waterloo in the summer of 1905. Stocks kept going up and would not go down. So one day the bears put out a story that Jacob H. Schiff was dead. That was quickly disproved. Then they said it was James Speyer who had been stricken with apoplexy. Immediately Mr. Speyer left his banking house and appeared on the floor of the exchange. Then some wit began to issue bulletins like these:

"'John D. Rockefeller was mortally wounded this morning by a golf ball.'

"'Andrew Carnegie crippled himself today while playing his pipe organ.'

"'J. P. Morgan lost his sight today while viewing a miniature statue of Venus.'

"'Hetty Green is on her deathbed with the pip.'

"That," said the old broker, "settled the death scare as a bear weapon. It was laughed out of the street."—Cincinnati Times-Star.

THE TEACHING OF AGRICULTURE

Interesting Paper by Professor R. R. Glenn

TAKEN FROM THE SCHOOL MASTER

Rural Schools Have the Power to Create a Love of Farm Life

A Great Opportunity for Teachers and Parents—One of the Leading Problems of Today

We are continually bewailing the fact that the trend of population is toward the cities and we are continually extolling the beauty and independence of country life, yet the fact continues that the majority of our young people are destined to leave the farms. Fathers and mothers deplore this tendency. Certainly there is much cause for alarm. Many of these young people will come far short of the perfection they might have attained had they remained in an atmosphere purified by sunshine and sweetened by flowers and growing grain. This movement already affects the character of country life for it is a movement of quality as well as quantity. Those who join in the throng streaming our strongest and bravest.

Many causes contribute to this movement. One of these is the isolation of the ordinary farm home. True this is in part removed by the rural telephone and free delivery of mail; but in many communities the young people come to feel themselves isolated and alone socially.

Another potent cause is due to a lack of interest in farm work and farm life. The average boy leaves the farm not because he fears or wishes to avoid hard work, but because he sees or thinks he sees there nothing but hard work. Little effort has been put forth to cultivate interest and enthusiasm in this work; and in too many cases it has been inbred in the boy that farm life will not pay as adequate returns for pluck, brains, and capital as will the more complex life of the city.

Again, are we of the country not directly contributing to this condition throughout apathy in the matter of establishing rural high schools and schools of agriculture for which our laws now amply provide?

If these causes are well taken, then we must look to our schools largely to check this movement of boys and girls from the farm homes. We have had free schools for decades and yet the only reading matter that enters many country homes is that supplied by the local papers. This is not because the better things do not appeal to these people, but it is because our schools have failed to live up to their opportunities in this matter. Educationally, free delivery is hardly justified unless it brings to our homes more that is wholesome and beautiful in literature. No excuse can be accepted from us as rural teachers for neglect to perform our duty in this matter. We cannot even plead a crowded program for the teaching of each pupil to be a good reader of good reading is fundamental.

The rural schools have the power to create the much needed love and interest for farm life. Today, we are teaching the boy more about the causes that make the Great Sahara a desert than about the causes that make his fathers farm barren and unprofitable. We seem anxious that our pupils may recite glibly about the ibex, the zebu, and the armadillo; but we care little if they know not the merits of the standard varieties of farm animals. We may not get schools of agriculture until a demand therefor is credited as a result of simple but practical teaching about such important home matters as the kinds and nature of soils, seed selection and testing, farm plants and animals, etc.

Then too, many boys and girls are going along devoid of a proper sense of the beautiful that everywhere surrounds them, perhaps dreaming of city attractions. In this, let us start right at home again by making some improvements in the many unsightly school grounds and buildings. We may transform these yards into something useful and pleasing; beautify the interior of our school houses, and teachers an appreciation of nature nowhere so well as in the country school. The country boy will continue to leave the farm so long as he continues to want to leave it. Herein lies the opportunity of parents and teachers. This matter is one of education not of compulsion. We do not nor should not want all country boys and girls to remain on the farm; but many a lonely fireside might have been gladdened advantageously to all concerned could the real nature of this problem have been understood.

Wilsoo Grange No. 719

Wilson grange met in regular session Saturday evening, March 13, with twenty-five members present and one visitor.

After the business session a very good program was given by the lecturer, who announced a subject for discussion next meeting. Two petitions to the legislature were read by the secretary and signed by the members. The secretary is very busy distributing grass seed and spring supplies to the members from the contract houses.

A dance will be given in the hall March 20.

The Difference

What is the difference between high grade and low grade baking powders?

All baking powders are white and are sold in round cans with bright labels. They look alike, but in contents they are very different.

High grade baking powders are made of pure cream of tartar derived from grapes. They are healthful and economical to use.

Low grade baking powders are made of alum an astringent mineral acid.

Before the Pure Food law only a chemist could tell by analysis one from the other.

But now baking powders have the ingredients printed on the back of the label. By reading the label the house keeper knows the ingredients and being careful of the welfare of our households, avoids the alum kind of baking powder.

Good baking powder is one of the most useful things in the kitchen—and there is a difference.

STORING THE ICE CROP.

Cutting the Cakes and Putting Them Away.

The ice season is not over. In many sections of the country the crop is now at its best. The usefulness of ice on the farm cannot be exaggerated. One who has made a business for fifteen years of storing ice says that five years ago he remodeled his old icehouse. A description of the remodeled structure follows:

It is 12 by 14 feet and 12 feet high on a two foot stone foundation. The studding is oak, 2 feet 8 inches, sheathed on both sides and filled between with sawdust. From the studding a two inch furring projects out with the siding on this, making an air space sufficiently large that the sides of the building are kept from becoming warm by the cool current which passed from the ground up and into the ice chamber. A 12 by 18 inch blind at each gable permits a free circulation of air and is in my estimation better than a cupola, as there is more of a draft over the ice. There are double doors four feet wide extending from the foundation to the eaves. A 4 by 4 inch scantling put in the peak for attaching a double pulley facilitates the handling of the ice. The man in the wagon sets the tongs in a cake, and another man in the doorway seizes it with his tongs as it is drawn up. In this way only three men are necessary at the building, one to unload and two to pack.

Beneath the building a number of eight inch tiles are set on end, with a little piece of board over each. On the dirt floor are six inches of sawdust. The cakes of ice are set on edge, each tier being finished and covered with a layer of sawdust before another is begun. It is better not to have the cakes too close together, so that the sawdust will sift down between. Sawdust is better than cracked ice to fill in with.

HAULING THE CROP.

as it does not leave air spaces and also prevents the cakes from freezing together so solidly. When filling loose boards are placed in front of the doors, and about ten or twelve inches back of them is filled in with sawdust. The icehouse is filled from a pond about a mile away. Ice saws are used and the cakes cut from twenty-five to thirty-five inches square. A common wagon box will hold two tiers, thirty cakes of eight inch ice. The capacity of this icehouse is forty tons, but of course any size could be built on the same plan, and a larger one would keep the ice in a much better condition.

Easily Adjustable Shelves.

The illustration shows an excellent way of supporting shelves. The upright supports have grooves sawed in them crosswise at intervals of three-quarters of an inch to one inch. A good sized hand rip saw makes these grooves wide enough. A flat strip of iron about two inches wide and just thick enough to fit into the grooves is bent into a Z shape, but with right angles, shown at the right in the figure. One such strip is put into a groove at each end at the desired height and the shelf laid upon them. This is the most satisfactory method of supporting shelves known, inasmuch as the shelves are adjustable, the only parts, iron strips, can never fall out unless the shelf be removed, and it permits of smaller differences of adjustment than any other kind of adjustable shelf. It is excellent for smokehouse, storeroom, workshop, pantry or cupboard.

STOMACH DISTRESS

And Indigestion Misery Ends Five Minutes Later

Almost Instant Relief from Dyspepsia and Stomach Trouble is Waiting for You

Every family here ought to keep some Dapepsin in the house, as any one of you may have an attack of indigestion or stomach trouble at any time, day or night.

This harmless preparation will digest anything you eat and overcome a sour stomach five minutes afterwards.

If your meals don't tempt you, or what little you do eat seems to fill you, or lays like a lump of lead in your stomach, or if you have heartburn, that is a sign of indigestion.

Ask your pharmacist for a 50-cent case of Pape's Diapepsin and take one triangle after supper tonight. There will be no sour risings, no belching of undigested food mixed with acid, no stomach gas or heartburn, fullness or heavy feeling in the stomach, nausea, debilitating headaches, dizziness or intestinal griping. This will all go, and besides, there will be no sour food left over in the stomach to poison your breath with unseens odors.

Pape's Diapepsin is a certain cure for all stomach misery, because it will take hold of your food and digest—it just the same as if your stomach wasn't there.

Actual, prompt relief for all your stomach misery is at your pharmacist waiting for you.

These large 50-cent cases contain more than sufficient to cure a case of dyspepsia or indigestion.

MICHIGAN CROP REPORT

For February Deals with Weather and Wheat

The temperature and precipitation averaged above normal. The ground was covered with snow most of the first two decades, but was nearly bare in the lower peninsula at the close of the month. A heavy sleet storm occurred in the southeastern portion of the lower peninsula on the 15th and 16th.

In answer to the question, "Has wheat during February suffered injury from any cause?" 116 correspondents in the southern counties answer "yes," and 193 "no;" in the central counties 86 answer "yes," and 65 "no," and in the northern counties 47 answer "yes" and 71 "no." Snow protected wheat in the southern counties 1.88 weeks, in the central counties 2.00, in the northern counties 2.61 and in the state 2.06 weeks.

The average depth of snow on February 12th was, in the southern counties 3.51 inches, in the central counties 8.91, in the northern counties 4.31 and in the state 3.57 inches. On the 28th the average depth of snow in the southern counties was 0.50 of an inch, in the central counties 0.72 of an inch, in the northern counties 4.28 inches and in the state 1.33 inches.

The total number of bushels of wheat marketed by farmers in February at 115 flouring mills is 132,380 and at 92 elevators and to grain dealers 93,517, or a total of 225,856 bushels. Of this amount 175,100 bushels were marketed in the southern four tiers of counties, 42,152 in the central counties and 8,705 in the northern counties. The estimated total number of bushels of wheat marketed in the seven months, August-February, is 7,000,000.

The amount of wheat yet remaining in possession of growers is estimated at 4,750,000 bushels. Seventy-eight mills, elevators and grain dealers report no wheat purchased in February.

The average condition of live stock in the state is reported as follows, comparison being made with stock in good, healthy and thrifty condition. Horses 96, cattle and swine 91 and sheep 95.

CONTEST IS WARMING UP

Liquor Interests Are Putting Up a Losing Fight

CASE OF THE PEOPLE VS SALOONS

Evidence so Far Given is Discredited.

A Statement From Each Side of the Case Fairly Stated But Strengthens Our First Conclusion.

True to our promise that the COURIER would allow space to each side in the case of the people vs. the saloons we have accepted every thing brought in by recognized authority.

How stands the case at this time? The saloon element, who are now masquerading under the name of the "Personal Liberty Committee," base their defense first, on the claim that "Prohibition does not Prohibit," citing as witnesses, alleged statements from Oakland, Wexford and Midland counties. A portion of the Oakland county witnesses have repudiated their alleged testimony, and, if one says falsehoods has been put in his mouth, it is a fair presumption that we can't accept the testimony of the others without further investigation. In Wexford county, the men whose alleged statements were published by the "wets," over their own signatures, announce them as fraudulent and forgeries. Midland county is the latest victim of misrepresentation. Examine the witnesses, two are proprietors of hotels which formerly had a saloon annex. Is it any wonder their business has fallen off? But they go still further and say that farmers will not go to a town to trade unless they can purchase booze, and, in the same statements, say that as much liquor is sold as before the county went dry. How do you like that my brother farmers? How do you like the charge that you are so wedded to the use of strong drink that you will not patronize a town that has banished saloons? We believe that you will hurl this insult back in the teeth of the men making it, by the votes which you will cast on the fifth of April. The question of whether prohibition prohibits is fully answered in the figures from the Internal Revenue department in another column.

But, they say, "The law will not be enforced." This is a direct charge against our public officials, who have given their word, as well as their official oath, that they will enforce the law, which disposes of this claim.

"Business will be paralized." By personal observation, as well as by inquiry of men who know, the evidence is that business is better where saloons are banished. We can't accept the view that a city's prosperity depends upon the amount of liquor consumed therein. This week we were called upon by a representative of one of the largest paper houses in the country; a man whose territory covers the dry counties of Michigan. In our search for light, we asked him in regard to the business conditions in those counties, particularly Midland. He replied, "Business is far better in all of them and growing better every day. So far as Midland is concerned it is far better and the statements published from there are absolute falsehoods. The hotel keepers whose names are signed thereto were proprietors of saloons of a low cast."

"Taxes will be higher." Suppose they are, which we don't believe, aren't you willing to give a dollar or two to rescue some family from want or suffering caused by the liquor traffic."

"You have no right to say by legislation what a man shall eat or drink." We admit it, but we have a right, under the constitution of the United States, to pass laws to "promote the general welfare;" to say what a man shall manufacture and sell, and to say that no man has a right to make a nuisance of himself nor a menace to the welfare of the state.

They publish statements from eminent divines in their attempts to bostler up a losing cause, some of them verging nearly on blasphemy. When were these statements made? There was a time when prohibitory laws were treated as farcial, and when these statements might have had weight. That time has passed and side-by-side with the prohibition wave has come a wave of law enforcement which says the laws must be obeyed.

Gentlemen the jig is up. By your own evidence your business is condemned. We have no quarrel with you but we do say your business must cease. No longer will the American people tolerate the liquor traffic.

THE LAST NUMBER

Of the Lecture Course Friday Evening March 26

The closing number of the citizens lecture course will occur Friday evening of this week at the Charlevoix opera house. This number is in many respects the great number of the course and everybody knows it in Charlevoix Dr. Driver was here three years ago and is called back this time on account of his great popularity in Charlevoix as well as in the hundreds of other places where he has lectured. The calls to this large field for lectures have been so numerous that Dr. Driver was led to give up his pastorate and now he devotes his entire time to popular lectures. Single admission to the lecture Friday night will be 35 and 50 cents.

COUNTY SYSTEM BEST

In the Opinion of Men who are Shrewd Observers

Letters From Editors in Counties Where Adopted

Editor Harley of the Manistee News writes:

"No person has ever heard to say in public that he regretted the adoption of the system. Under it we have literally transformed this county from a wilderness to a settled, civilized country district, with easy communication where most needed. Hills have been graded down, ravines filled, hills banked with sod and many miles of pike laid.

"The value of the land must have been tremendously enchanced by this work; much of it was before practically inaccessible, and would have so remained to this day but for the county road system.

"The city has gained business, and would be as unwilling as the townships to abandon the plan, although the city pays more than half the cost."

Editor Tinklepaugh of the Kalkaska Leader:

"Kalkaska county was one of the first of the counties in Michigan to adopt the county road system, and although hampered in a considerable degree by the lack of suitable material for road building, I think everything considered, that we have made commendable progress, and from what I know of what has been accomplished here, were I to remove to some other county which was considering the advisability of adopting the county road system, I would use whatever influence I might happen to possess to secure the adoption of the system. I believe it to be a movement in the right direction and an infallible indication of a progressive spirit and a determination to keep abreast of the times in the vital matter of good roads. As you doubtless know that is not a thickly settled nor a wealthy county, and we have had to move somewhat slowly. Doubtless, also some mistakes were made owing to lack of experience in the initial stages of the work: but steady progress has been made and now we have, roughly speaking, about thirty-five miles of county roads—highways that everything considered, will compare very favorably with those of any county in Michigan. It might be argued that this is not, in the matter of milage, a very considerable amount of county road, but we have built according to our means, and the tax has not been burdensome. Moreover, we have accumulated at considerable expense a very complete road building equipment, and our commissioners have gained valuable experience from year to year, while, so far as my observation goes, the people generally are satisfied with the results so far obtained, and are anxious to have the system extended as rapidly as circumstances will permit, and it is my belief that there are very few among the citizens of this county who would be willing to return to the system in vogue prior to the adoption of the present one.

Personally I am not sufficiently familiar with the details of the work done, so far, as to give anything in the way of statistics and figures, but would say most emphatically, that if the county road system has proved its worth in Kalkaska county, where there is a great lack of suitable road building material, it should prove even more satisfactory and desirable in sections where an abundance of such material is easily and cheaply obtainable, and it is my conviction that no farmer who has his own best interests at heart should fail to vote for the adoption of the county road system should the opportunity be presented to him.

With twenty-nine counties in the race,
Charlevoix's one to take her place,
The "drys" say the saloon must go,
But the "wets" say "nit," we'll spend our dough,
We'll buy all the votes, and rent all the stores,
Then we'll see if we have to close doors.
Why, if whiskey and beer we could not sell,
Our town and county would go to——, Well,
We'd be just ruined, that is all,
And our resort business would take a fall,
Taxes would be just out of sight,
If we did not pay for getting folks tight,
We think that our license to ruin souls,
Should not be affected this spring at the polls.
Must we spend all this money for votes, and then lose,
Sure we can't entertain unless we have booze,
There'd be empty stores in town by the score,
If we did not have the saloons any more.
They'd have to be rented on some other condition,
And legitimate business have more competition.
We'll boycott the drys, it'll make a good weapon,
And they'll think Local Option's a poor plank to step on.
Of the druggists around who seem to be "wet,"
We will ask the question already, yet,
If the drug stores in dry towns have such increased sales,
Why aren't you dry and out with your pails.

Such arguments make the voters all sick,
They'll go to the polls and vote dry mighty quick,
As to empty buildings, we've heard the rot),
That a Y. M. C. A. could be made of the "Bnd."
And some others be put to much better uses,
Than they are now, as dispensers of juices,
Now as to our wet brothers boycott threat,
The dry ones can work it as well as the wet,
Either side of the question you please to take,
You know which is right if you're but half awake,
As to results, you know it is best,
To vote for the right, and trust God for the rest.
Each side claims to nail the other one's lie,
But the difference is known, between you and I,
Let's not think of dollars, or even of cents,
Or not of our neighbors, just over the fence,
Make principle work, heed not revenue noise,
Be men,—vote to save all our girls and our boys,
Local Option is coming; it was well begun,
And we've got our wet brothers all on the run,
Other counties have tried it, both thin and thick,
If they are not well pleased, pray why do they stick?
If you want the saloon to go, vote YES,
As here illustrated, and then we guess.

YES [X]

NO [ ]

When the ballots are counted, 'twill be just so,
There'll not be a cross in one square after No.

Pleasant Afternoons Spent at Homes of Different Members During Month

Feburary 25 the ladies were entertained by Mrs. George Cook at her home on the north terrace. Each lady was asked to embroider her name in the friendship quilt and the afternoon was spent very pleasantly. A five o'clock dinner was served.

March 4 a public tea cent tea was was given at the home of Mrs. John Miller on the south terrace. About fifty friends turned out to give the ladies the glad hand by aiding the corps financially.

March 11 was the regular corps meeting and we had a full attendance, all offices being filled. Our new badges were passed around and admired. Two new members were initiated and six applications for membership read and passed upon. The president reported having received a nice, cheerful letter from Mrs. Whitmore, of California saying, "she was glad to see by the papers, Baxter W. R. C. was coming to the front." She enclosed three dollars as a present to the flower fund. Being a charter member we tendered her a vote of thanks and reinstated her name on the books.

March 18 we were invited to Mrs. N. Shores home of the north terrace and a very sociable afternoon was enjoyed by all the W. R. C. and many of their friends who were invited. It was understood that all who wished might place any amount from ten cents to one dollar on the plate furnished for the purpose and about three dollars was realized for the flower fund.

Lady Bees come and bring your honeybees and help along the fun and finances, Tuesday evening, March 30. Admission 10 cents. 12-1t

COMING AGAIN

CITY CANDIDATES SCARCE

Two Tickets Will be Placed Before Voters This Spring.

City politics are very quiet in Charlevoix this spring. Caucuses have been called by both the Republican and Labor parties, the Labor party tonight and the Republican ward caucuses Monday night and city convention Tuesday afternoon.

For mayor, Captain O. E. Wilbur authorizes us to make the announcement that he will be a candidate for the Republican nomination. Captain Wilbur's long experience as a member of the city council and, for a goodly portion of the time, acting mayor, makes him a peculiarly strong candidate We have also heard the name of S. A. Marting mentioned by his friends. On the Labor ticket, Mayor Rose will be a candidate and we have also heard the name of Ex-Mayor Iddings mentioned. Both have filled the office and would stand on their records.

For aldermen: In the first, S. A. Marting, C. L. Gonser and R. W. Paddock are mentioned as Republican candidates. In the second, W. J. Rachow is being urged for the Republican nomination. In the third, Alderman Ward will probably be opposed by Ex-Alderman Webster, which would be a contest between two very strong men,

CHANGE JUDICIAL CIRCUIT

Charlevoix Interested in Bill of Representative Odell

Benzie County is Added to this Circuit Making Five Counties

Representative Odell's bill amending the law establishing the judicial circuits in Michigan eliminates twenty-eighth circuit in which Judge Chittenden presides. The judge has decided to go west and will resign his place on the bench.

Under the Odell bill the thirteenth district will be composed of Antrim, Benzie, Charlevoix, Grand Traverse and Leelanau; Fourteenth Lake, Mason, Muskegon and Oceana counties; Nineteenth, Kalkaska, Manistee, Osceola, Missaukee and Wexford. As the law stands the twenty-eighth district takes in Benzie, Kalkaska, Wexford and Missaukee.

The thirteenth district now includes Charlevoix, Antrim, Grand Traverse and Leelanau. Benzie is added by the new bill. The nineteenth district includes as it stands, Manistee, Mason, Lake and Osceola. Manistee and Osceola are left in the Nineteenth by the new bill. Kalkaska and Wexford of the Twenty-eighth are added to this district.

The fourteenth, as it stands includes Oceana and Muskegon. Lake and Mason are added by the Odell bill.

CHALEVOIX OPENS THE CAMPAIGN

By a Monster Meeting at Charlevoix Theater

HON. J. M. HARRIS PRINCIPAL SPEAKER

Leading Citizens Also Pledged Allegiance

Hon. L. F. Knowles Opens Grange Campaign at South Arm Thursday Night—Grangers Will Redeem Their Pledge of Assistance.

Sunday afternoon the local option campaign was opened in Charlevoix by a mass meeting at the Charlevoix Theater and Charlevoix joined her sister cities in proving, by the interest taken, that she will not be found wanting when the votes are counted April 5.

When Mayor Rose, who presided, called the meeting to order he looked over a vast audience that crowded the capacity of the large building, it being estimated that a thousand of our citizens were present to listen to the arguments for the banishment of the saloon, while back of him, on the stage, were assembled representatives of the business, professional and working men of the city. Music was furnished by the orchestra and the entire audience joined a quartette, composed of Dr. F. H. Wilkinson, Charles Wilkinson, W. H. Woodley and J. M. Saunders, in singing songs expressly written for the occassion.

Hon. J. M. Harris, the first speaker, took up the arguments of the liquor dealers, one by one, and proved the falsity of their position. Judge Harris gave the official figures of the poor superintendents to show that ninety-five per cent of our county charges owed their present position to the liquor traffic besides giving numerous instances, where the use of liquor, by their natural protectors, has caused women and children to become objects of charity, both public and private.

A. L. Fitch, in a few short remarks, disproved the claims of the wet-element that the closing of saloons would cause our summer visitors to go elsewhere, his business relations with them having shown him that the facts were otherwise.

E. S. Stacks, Hon. A. Buttars, J. M. Saunders, Richard Lewis, Hon. H. L. Iddings, F. A. Smith and Andrew Ross each gave a few remarks of allegiance to the cause of local option.

Captain Perdan gave numerous instances which he had had in his twenty-seven years of experience as an officer in this city, of the blighting influence of the saloon.

W. H. Miller effectually disposed of the claims of the lack of resort business, his business relations being with the resort trade, he spoke with a full knowledge of the view they had of the question.

A. L. Coulter gave the figures of the internal revenue department to prove that "prohibition does prohibit" and announced the dissolution of the partnership existing between the liquor dealer and himself.

Superintendent Woodley told the truth in regard to South Haven, speaking from his personal knowledge, which was absolutely contradictory to the claims of the wet element.

R. W. Kane, in a few words, explained the needs of the committee in their fight against the enemy.

If any one doubted the interest of the people of this city in the issue, Sunday's meeting removed all doubt from their mind. For over two hours the vast audience listened to the addresses, at no time manifesting the slightest restlessness.

One thing that received much favorable comment was the fact that no speaker indulged in personalities, but all were careful to explain that it was a fight against the business and not against the men engaged therein.

CORRESPONDENCE

FROM NORWOOD.

The post office inspector visited the Norwood post office last week.

The boys are reorganizing their base ball nine for summer playing.

Mrs. Emphey of Atwood spent Sunday with her sister, Mrs. Wagner.

The township board met last Tuesday, it being their annual meeting.

Jess Teeny is back to Norwood for the summer and will work for John Bugbee.

Mr. and Mrs. Turcott of Elk Rapids, visited at the home of Jerry Santose last week.

Marion See commenced work Monday morning at Maxim Gennett's for the summer.

Miss Lady will entertain the Ladies' Aid at the home of Mrs. Valentine next Saturday afternoon.

Caucus will be held at the Town Hall Friday, March 26, for the purpose of nominating township officers.

The Catholic ladies of Norwood and Atwood had a very pleasant surprise on Mrs. Dennis March 15, it being her seventieth birthday.

The farmers have their ice houses well filled, Chase & Pearl having secured a plow from Charlevoix, thus making the work lighter than in former days.

Ben Pearl has Geo. H. VanPelt's cottage to paper throughout, also several farm houses. The paper arrived last week and Ben intends to begin right away.

The old pals of the harvest field certainly did things up "brown" on the evening of March 17 at the home of William Richardson. Games were played at which Jack, Ike and Pete always held the best but Joe and Ike were not so slow at the light fantastic. Some fine selections of music were listened to, after which Mr. Richardson served lunch, and he knows how if anybody does. At 12:30 the boys went home, satisfied that they had had a good time without a woman in the house.

FROM CLARION

Mrs. W. H. Ransom went to Big Rapids Friday.

Oliver Dunton and family have moved back to Clarion.

Mr. and Mrs. O. V. Holly returned Saturday from Resort.

Mr. Wickett of Elmira, is visiting his brother, A. B. Wickett.

Ila Rogs and Bertha McDonald are suffering with seven cases of measles.

William Ecker, who has been seriously ill for some time, is able to be out again.

Mrs. Will Jenkins and Mrs. Hattie Case of Harbor Springs, were Clarion visitors last week.

We are glad to learn that Mrs. H. A. Bixby of Walloon, is slowly recovering from her injuries.

Greg Vantilburg and wife left Thursday evening for Elkhart, Indiana, for a two weeks visit.

Mrs. Florence Hunt was called home from Mt. Pleasant last week by the serous illness of her mother, Mrs. Wooden.

James Pearson of Petoskey, and son, Bert Pearson of Alpena, visited at Mrs. Sarah Wooden's Sunday. They also called at Shoemil farm.

Delbert Herrington, who returned a short time ago from New Mexico, seems benefited by the change. The trip to New Mexico did not improve his health as it was hoped it would.

FROM BAY SHORE.

Clarence White is confined to his home with the grip.

Mrs. J. H. Ericks is confined to her home with the grip.

Mr. Stacks drove over from Charlevoix Saturday on business.

Mr. Burch expects to have gas lights put in his home this week.

Mr. and Mrs. Barrick's two youngest children are sick with whooping cough.

Mrs. J. H. Ericks went to Charlevoix Monday to visit her sister, Mrs. Joe Blair.

The L. O. T. M. M. will add another new member to their hive, Mrs Fred Zipp, this meeting.

H. Parks got his knee badly bruised Tuesday afternoon but was able to be at his work the next day.

The family of Joe Price are all very sick with pneumonia and whooping cough. Two are not expected to live.

Mrs. Ed. Yohr entertained Mr. and Mrs. Parks and Mr. and Mrs. Ericks with cards Saturday evening A nice lunch was served at 10:30.

A surprise party was given Mr. Burch's sister, Miss Florence, Friday evening. About twenty of the young friends spent the evening with her. Games and music were played. Light refreshments were served.

A very pleasant surprise was given at the home of Mrs. Burch Tuesday afternoon. Sixteen ladies were present and a very enjoyable afternoon was spent in playing cards and lunch, after which a bountiful supper was served. Before going to their homes, they all joined in singing hymns.

COUNTY NORMAL NOTES.

The class has ordered pictures of the different kinds of birds to be used in their work next year.

Lucile Romoser of Traverse City, visited the normal room Friday afternoon.

Ruth Bowdish and Edith Brodie are still unable to attend school on account of sickness.

CAUSE FOR ALARM

Loss of Appetite or Distress After Eating a Symptom that Should Not be Disregarded

Appetite is just a natural desire for food. Loss of appetite or stomach distress after eating indicates indigestion or dyspepsia. Overeating is a habit very dangerous to a person's good general health, and insatiable appetite is a sure symptom of diabetes.

It is not what you eat but what you digest and assimilate that does you good. Some of the strongest, heaviest and healthiest persons are moderate eaters.

There is nothing that will create sickness or cause more trouble than a disordered stomach, and many people daily contract serious maladies simply through disregard or abuse of the stomach.

We urge everyone in Charlevoix who is suffering from any stomach derangement, indigestion or dyspepsia, whether acute or chronic, to try Rexall dyspepsia tablets, with the distinct understanding that we will refund their money without question or formality, if after reasonable use of this medicine, they are not perfectly satisfied with the results. We recommend them to our customers every day, and have yet to hear of anyone who has not been benefited by them. We honestly believe them to be without equal. They are made from the prescription of a physician who devoted all his time to the study and treatment of stomach troubles. They give very prompt relief, neutralize the gastric juices, strengthen the digestive organs, create good digestion and assimilation, naturally regulate the bowels, promote perfect nutrition, and create a permanent cure of all unhealthy symptoms.

We urge you to try a 25c box of Rexall dyspepsia tablets, which gives 15 days treatment. At the end of that time, your money will be returned to you if you are not satisfied. Of course, in chronic cases length of treatment varies. For such cases, we have two larger sizes, which sell for 45c and 89c. Ivy drug store, A. B. Fleischer, proprietor.

How to Clean a Lece Doily.

To clean a thread lace doily wrap it carefully around a bottle, then fold it around a piece of muslin to hold it in place. Put the bottle into a pan of hot water and add borax to make a strong suds. Let it remain in the water overnight, rinse it carefully and remove from the bottle. It should be pinned to a pillowcase upon the floor to dry, each notch held in place with a pin. Another good method is to make it real wet, place it on a glass slab and draw every notch into place with a hairpin. When dry cover with a thin piece of material and press. Fine thread doilies should not be starched, wrung or rubbed in the process of cleaning them. If doilies are laid away cover them separately with blue paper, roll on a mailing tube, wrap all in blue paper and put them into a box.

Drink For Tired Horses.

A horseman says that for horses fagged out after a tiring journey there is no safer or better tonic than a "white drink" made by stirring in a bucket of water a pint of oatmeal off which the chill has been taken. White drinks of this kind are not only good thirst quenchers, but they also seem to act as a restorative and are found to be very effective in enabling animals to regain strength lost through illness or severe exertion.

TRIMMINGS FOR THE TURKEY.

How to Decorate the Bird For the Christmas Dinner.

The Christmas turkey is dressed with as much care as the hostess and in more colors. If it be a family turkey a wealth of paper ribbons adorns it and a grouping of parsley rosettes trims its sides. Half a lemon makes a bend for his turkeyship, and of course it rests in a bed of green, fluffy edible. The turkey is browned before his exterior treatment begins, and in this matter there is only one rule, which is that he shall be browned all over. He must be done "just to a turn," and the turn is a deep, rich brown, almost as dark as seal brown, but very shiny, with the shine caused by the richness of his cookery. Now the turkey is taken out, and a platter specially prepared for him is brought forth. This is heated and is covered with green, and for this the pretty watercress plant is as decorative as anything. Take his birdship and while he is still sizzling tie around him a paper chain. Let it be made in a sort of effect which is so becoming to the American king of table birds. Carry this ruching of ribbon around his noble breast and fasten it in the back, so that as he lies upon his back his breast will rise in a handsome, graceful arch, adorned by the ribbon.

The turkey will want also a few rosettes upon skewers of wood, or metal will answer the purpose. Do not let the turkey go to the table minus a head or minus a tail. A lemon cut in half, with a few notches for balancing purposes, will answer for both places. Take the half of a lemon that is to make a head and let it rest in a bed of parsley. The turkey must have his wristlets, for no turkey looks well without them. For wristlets or paper cuffs you can buy the cuffs that come for this purpose, or if you cannot buy them handily you can make them. Take of firm white paper enough to go around the turkey's leg. Fold the paper and when it is folded slash it. Cut it as though you were making a fringe. Now glue the cuff into shape. Let it dry and you have an ornament for the turkey's leg. This will protect your fingers from grease when you nibble the drumstick.

FRESHENING UP GARMENTS.

How Old Dresses Can Be Made to Look Like New.

To a girl whose frocks are few spring is not that season of untrammeled joy of which poets sing, for, alas, the time of putting on thin dresses has not yet arrived, and those she has worn through the winter show they are not new, and for the average young woman it is not easy to be contended with old clothes. Where new ones are out of the question much may be done for little cost to freshen old garments if a girl will give time to the remodeling.

Dressing, sponging and putting on new finishings will really do wonders for an old suit, for example. Just as the best cloth dress in the world would not look well were it not pressed, so steaming and ironing will spruce up the old. Try it on one and see.

Take an old skirt, begin to rip at the waistband and unpick enough to allow it to lie perfectly flat. Then arrange an ironer's dress board on two chair backs, get a basin of hot water and a little liquid ammonia set in the seat of the chair where it will be handy. Next get a piece of cloth—any sort will do—such as tweed or covert coating, cut it about half a yard square or less and have three or four very hot irons at the fire. These are the most important, as they must just be under scorching point, and a stiff clothes brush will be needed.

Having collected all the requisites and spread the dress over the board, dip the piece of cloth in the water and wring it out as dry as possible, then spread it like a patch over the dress, smooth it down and iron quickly with the hottest iron. As soon as the iron has passed over the whole surface of the patch tear it quickly off, and while the cloth below is steaming brush up the nap with the clothes brush and leave it while you proceed to do the next square of the skirt, repeating the same process until the entire garment has been ironed that way.

How to Carve Successfully.

When carving use a chair slightly higher than the ordinary size, as this will give one better purchase on the meat. This also appears more graceful than standing, as is sometimes necessary when carving a turkey or a large joint. It requires more skill than strength to carve successfully. Commence by cutting the meat in thin slices and lying them carefully on one side of the platter and afterward laying the desired amount on each guest's plate. In carving fish, game or joints the carver should acquaint himself with the choicest pieces and should serve each guest an equal share of these, giving preference to none. Be careful when carving fish to keep it in perfect flakes, for if these are broken the beauty of the fish is lost. A steel carving knife should never come in contact with intense heat, for this destroys its temper, and it should never be used in the kitchen or for any use except carving meat.

How to Prepare For Danger From Fires

If a fire breaks out near your home do not get into a panic, but prepare for emergencies. Remove draperies from the windows and roll up shades tight so that there is less inflammable material about. Close all windows to prevent drafts, and on the side of the fire shut the shutters unless you wish the glass to crack with the heat. Collect your most valuable belongings and pack them so that they may be removed at a minute's notice. If you have heavy old pieces of family furniture or pictures on the second floor have them brought to the lower floor. If fire once breaks out it will be impossible to bring them downstairs. Pack your dresses and other clothes in clothes baskets or hampers; they are less unwieldly than trunks. Keep jewelry and money tied around your neck. In the excitement they may be stolen from hand bags.

How to Save Stockings While Dancing.

Girls will not be half so apt to dance holes in their delicate silk stockings if only they will have slippers powdered inside. This simple operation permits the silk and shoe to rub together with decidedly less friction and the wear is thus not so great. A girl who dances much and who wears exquisitely embroidered stockings with all her party frocks and who feels a distinct grievance when holes appear has hit upon a plan that works well with her for preserving the hosiery intact. She glues a small piece of velvet inside the back of the heel on each shoe.

How to Clean White Marble.

To clean marble use a mixture of lemon juice and whiting or vinegar and whiting. Spread it on the marble and let it lie an hour or so and then wash off with pure water. Use no soap. Fine table salt is used also to remove a stain from marble. Oil of vitriol will remove an iron stain from marble. Let it remain on the stain for twenty minutes, then wash and dry with a soft cloth.

How to Polish the Hair.

If you are in the habit of wearing your hair plain you can polish it in the Japanese fashion. Take a piece of velvet or a small piece of woolen goods and pour a small amount of olive oil on it and shake it partly dry. Then rub it over the hair until it shines beautifully, but do not use enough of the oil to make the hair the least bit greasy.

A Road Axiom.

A chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and a road is no better than its muddiest spot.

Chapter 28

AS Harry stood again in the obscure half darkness of his cell it came to him that the present had a far-reaching significance; that it was but the handiwork and resultant of forces in his own past. He himself had set Hugh's feet on the red path that had polluted him to the shameful terminus. He had gambled for Hugh's future, forgetting that his past remained, a thing that must be covered. He had won Hugh's counters, but his own right to be himself he had staked and lost long before that game on the communion table under the polluted crucifixion.

The words he had once said to Hugh recurred to him with a kind of awe: "Put myself in your place? I wish to God I could!"

Fate—or was it God?—had taken him at his word. He had been hurled like a stone from a catapult into Hugh's place—to bear his knavery, to suffer his dishonor and to redeem the baleful reputation he had made.

A step outside the cell, the turning of the key. The door opened, and Jessica, pale and trembling, stood on the threshold.

"I cannot help it," she said as she came toward him, "though you told me not to come. I have trusted all the while and waited and—and prayed. But today I was afraid. Surely, surely, the man you are protecting has had time enough. Hasn't he? Won't you tell them the truth now?"

He knew not how to meet the piteous reproach and terror of that look. She had not heard the street preacher's declaration, he knew, but even if she had it would have been to her only an echo of the old mooted likeness. He had given her comfort once, but this was no more to be, no matter what it meant to him or to her.

"Jessica," he said steadily, "when you came to me here that first day and I told you not to fear for me I did not mean to deceive you. I thought then that it would all come right. But something has happened since then—something that makes a difference. I cannot tell who was the murderer of Morean. I cannot tell you or any one else, either now or at any time."

She gazed at him startled. She had a sudden conception of some element hitherto unguessed in his make-up—something inveterate and adamant. Could it be that he did not intend to tell at all? The very idea was monstrous. Yet that clearly was his meaning. She looked at him with flashing eyes.

"You mean you will not!" she exclaimed bitterly. "You are bent on sacrificing yourself, then? You are going to take this risk because you think it brave and noble, because somehow it fits your man's gospel. Can't you see how wicked and selfish it is? You are thinking only of him and of yourself, not of me."

"Jessica, Jessica!" he protested, with a groan. But in the self torture of her questionings she paid no heed.

"Don't you think I suffer? Haven't I borne enough in the months since I married you for you to want to save me this? Do you owe me nothing, me whom you so wronged, whose"—

She stopped suddenly at the look on his face of mortal pain, for she had struck harder than she knew. It pierced through the fierce resentment to her deepest heart, and all her love and pity gushed back upon her in a torrent. She threw herself on her knees by the bare cot, crying passionately:

"Oh, forgive me! Forget what I said! I did not mean it. I have forgiven you a thousand times over. I never ceased to love you. I love you now more than all the world."

"It is true," he said, hoarse misery in his tone. "I have wronged you. If I could coin my blood drop by drop to pay for the least I could not set that right. If giving my life over and over again would save you pain I would give it gladly. But what you ask now is one thing I cannot do. It would make me a pitiful coward. I did not kill Morean. That is all I can say to you or to those who try me."

"Your life!" she said with dry lips. "It will mean that. That counts so fearfully much to me, more than my own life a hundred times. Yet there is something that counts more than all that to you."

His face was that of a man who holds his hand in the fire. "Jessica," he said, "it is like this with me. When you found me here—the day I saw you on the balcony—I was a man whose soul had lost its compass and its bearings. My conscience was asleep. You woke it, and it is fiercely alive now. And now with my memory has come back a debt of my past that I never paid. Whatever the outcome, for my soul's sake I must settle it now and wipe it from the score forever."

She rose slowly to her feet, with a despairing gesture.

"'He saved others,'" she quoted in a hard voice; "'himself he could not save!' I once heard a minister preach from that text at home. It was your friend, the Rev. Henry Sanderson. I thought it a very spiritual sermon then. That was before I knew what his companionship had been to you."

"If there were any justice in the universe," she added, "it should be he immolating himself now, not you. But for him you would never be here. He ruined your life and mine, and I hate and despise him for a selfish hypocrite."

That was what he himself had seemed to her in those old days. The edge of a flush touched his forehead as he said slowly, almost appealingly:

"He was not a hypocrite, Jessica. Whatever he was it was not that. At college he did what he did too openly. That was his failing, not caring what others thought. He despised weakness in others. He thought it none of his affair. So others were influenced. But after he came to see things differently from another standpoint—when he went into the ministry—he would have given the world to undo it."

"Men's likings are strange," she said. "Because he never had temptations like yours and has never done what the law calls wrong you think he is as noble as you—noble enough to shield a murderer to his own danger."

"Ah, no, Jessica!" he interposed gently. "I only said that in my place he would do the same."

"But you are shielding a murderer," she insisted fiercely. "You will not admit it, but I know. There can be no justice or right in that. If Harry Sanderson is all you think him, if he stood here now and knew the whole, he would say it was wicked—not brave and noble, but wicked and cruel."

He shook his head, and the sad shadow of a bitter smile touched his lips. "He would not say so," he said.

"It should be he immolating himself now, not you."

A dry sob answered him. He turned and leaned his elbows on the narrow window sill, every nerve aching, but powerless to comfort. He heard her step. The door closed sharply.

Then he faced into the empty cell, sat down on the cot and threw out his arms, with a hopeless cry:

"Jessica, Jessica!"

* * * * * * *

Jessica left the jail with despair in her heart. The hope on which she had fed these past days had failed her. What was there left for her to do? Like a swift wind, she went up the street to Felder's office. She groped her way up the unlighted stair and tapped on the door. There was no answer. She pushed it open and entered the empty outer room, where a study lamp burned on the desk.

A pile of legal looking papers had been set beside it, and with them lay a torn page of a newspaper whose familiar caption gave her a stab of pain. Perhaps the news of the trial had found its way across the ranges to where the names of Stires and Morean had been known. Perhaps every one at Aniston already knew of it, was reading about it, defying her. She picked it up and scanned it hastily. There was no hint of the trial, but her eye caught the news which had played its role in the courtroom, and she read it to the end.

Even in her own trouble she read it with a shiver. Yet, awful as the fate which Harry Sanderson had so narrowly missed, it was not to be compared with that which awaited Hugh, for, awful as it was, it held no shame.

—In a gust of feeling she slipped to her knees by the one sofa the room contained and prayed passionately. As she drew out her handkerchief to stanch the tears that came something fell with a musical tinkle at her feet. It was the little cross she had found in front of the hillside cabin that had lain forgotten in her pocket during the past anxious days. As she pressed it the ring at the top gave way, and the cross parted in halves. Words were engraved on the inside of the arms—a date and the name Henry Sanderson.

The recurrence of the name jarred and surprised her. Hugh had dropped it—an old keepsake of the friend who had been his bean ideal, his exemplar and whose ancient influence was still dominant. He had clung loyally to the memento, blind in his constant liking, to the wrong that friend had done him. She looked at the date. It was May 28. She faltered, for that was the month and day on which Dr. Morean had been killed. The point had been clearly established today by the prosecution. To the original owner of that cross perhaps the date that had come into Hugh's life with such a sinister meaning was a glad anniversary.

Suddenly she caught her hand to her cheek. A weird idea had rushed through her brain. The religious symbol had stood for Harry Sanderson, and the chance coincidence of date had irresistibly related to the murder. To her excited senses the juxtaposition held a bizarre, uncanny suggestion. This cross, the very emblem of vicarious sacrifice! Suppose Harry Sanderson had never given it to Hugh! Suppose he had lost it on the hillside himself!

She snatched up the paper again. "Who has been for some months on a prolonged vacation"—the phrase stared sardonically at her. That might carry far back—she said it under her breath, fearfully—beyond the murder of Dr. Morean. Her face burned, and her breath came sharp and fast. Why when she brought her warning to the cabin had Hugh been so anxious to get her away unless to prevent her sight of the man who was there, to whom he had taken her horse? Who was there in Smoky Mountain whom he would protect at hazard of his own life?

Jessica's veins were all afire. A rector murderer? A double career? Was it beyond possibility? It came to her like an impinging ray of light, the old curious likeness that had sometimes been made a jest of at the white house in the aspens. Morean and Prendergast had believed it to be Hugh. So had the town, for the body had been found on his ground. But on the night when the real murderer came again to the cabin perhaps it was his coming that had brought back the lost memory. Hugh had known the truth. In the light of this supposition, his strained manner then, his present determination not to speak, all stood plain.

What had he meant by a debt of his past that he had never paid? He could owe no debt to Harry Sanderson. If he owed any debt it was to his dead father, a thousand times more than the draft he had repaid. Could—he—be thinking in his remorse that his father had cast him off, counting himself nothing, remembering only that Harry Sanderson had been David Stires' favorite and St. James', which must be smirched by the odium of its rector, the apple of his eye?

Jessica had snatched at a straw, because it was the only buoyant thing afloat in the dragging tide. Now with a blind fatuousness she hugged it tighter to her bosom. One purpose possessed her—to confront Harry Sanderson. What matter though she missed the reminder of the trial? She could do nothing. Her hands were tied. If the truth lay at Aniston she would find it. She thought no farther than this. Once in Harry Sanderson's presence, what she should say or do she scarcely imagined. The horrifying question filled her thought to the exclusion of all that must follow its answer. It was surety and self conviction she craved, only to read in his eyes the truth about the murder of Morean.

She suddenly began to tremble. Would the doctors let her see him? What excuse could she give? If he was the man who had been in Hugh's cabin that night he had heard her speak, had known she was there. He must not know beforehand of her coming lest he have suspicion of her errand. Bishop Ludlow, he could gain her access to him. Injured, dying perhaps, maybe he did not guess that Hugh was in jeopardy for his crime. Guilty and dying, if he knew this, he would surely tell the truth. But if he died before she could reach him? The paper was some days old. He might be dead already. She took heart, however, from the statement of his improved condition.

She sprang to her feet and looked at her chatelaine watch. The eastbound express was overdue. There was no time to lose. Minutes might count. She examined her purse. She had money enough with her.

Five minutes later she was at the station, a scribbled note was on its way to Mrs. Hallorau, and before a swinging red lantern the long incoming train was shuddering to a stop.

Chapter 29

IN the long hospital the air was cool and filtered, drab figures passed with soft footfalls and voices were measured and hushed. But no sense of coolness or repose had come to the man whose racked body had been tenderly borne there in the snowy dawn which saw the blackened ruins of Aniston's most perfect edifice.

Hugh had sunk into unconsciousness with the awe struck exclamation ringing in his ears, "Good God, it's Harry Sanderson!" He had drifted back to conscious knowledge with the same words racing in his brain. They puzzled that so far as capture went the old, curious resemblance would stand his friend till he betrayed himself or till the existence of the real Harry Sanderson at Smoky Mountain did so for him. The delusion must hold till he could leave himself moved to some place where his secret would be safer, till he could get away.

This thought grew swiftly paramount; it overlapped the right agony of his hours that made the bed an

CHARLEVOIX OPENS THE CAMPAIGN

Charlevoix has spoken as well as East Jordan and Boyne City and her verdict is "Saloons Must Go."

Thursday night the COURIER'S editor and E. S. Stacks attended the local option meeting held under the auspices of South Arm grange, and the interest there shown was proof positive that the members of the grange will redeem their pledge of the use of all their influence for the banishment of the saloon. The principal speaker of the evening, Hon. L. F. Knowles, in an eloquent address, told of the expense, misery and desolation caused by the saloon, giving instance after instance which had come under his observation in a professional way. Other speakers gave the result of their observation in dry states.

H. L. Olney and A. M. Murphy, speaking for South Arm grange, promised that the grange would not be found lacking when the votes were counted.

Music was furnished by the Jordan Glee club under the direction of B. A. Dole.

Self Denial

The Salvation Army is actively engaged in preparing for its annual week of self denial which has now become an established custom throughout the world. The dates fixed are April 11 to 18 inclusive. Last year the Army raised a large sum by their means, which enabled it to pursue its Missionary, Spiritual and Social work with uninterrupted success.

Few people seem to realize what a vast and world-wide movement this has become. These modern crusaders have now 22,028 officers and cadets (including socials) under their banners working in fifty-four countries and colonies, and in their own energetic way they are preaching the gospel to the poor in about 30 different languages.

Special expeditions are expected for China, and the vast territory of Russia.

Of social institutions the Army has a vast net-work numbering in all about 800.

The Army always adopts some self-sacrificing measures in order to raise the amount of money agreed upon. Every member, as well as the friends of the movement, is being requested to abstain from any article of food or clothing which may be considered in the least degree luxurious or unnecessary and many of the officers are even denying themselves of that which many of us are apt to regard as absolute necessities, in order that they may contribute something to the common fund.

That the effort will meet with success goes without saying, and there is no doubt that the friends of this movement, recognizing the vast amount of good already accomplished will not fail to afford their practical recognition when the proper time arrives.

ELECTION NOTICE

To the electors of the County of Charlevoix:

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Supervisors of said county held on the 13th day of October 1908, the following resolution was adopted:

BISHOP GILLESPIE DEAD

Had Been Head of This Diocese Thirty-Four Years.

Was One of Our Best Known Summer Residents.

Bishop George DeNormandie Gillespie, for 34 years head of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of western Michigan, died early Friday morning at his home in Grand Rapids of infirmities attending his extreme age.

Bishop Gillespie was born in Goshen, N. Y., June 14, 1819. The year after he attained his majority he gradnated from the General Theological seminary of New York. He served in St. Peter's church, New York, to St. Mark's church, Leroy, to St. Paul's church, Cincinnati, to Zion's church, Palmyra, N. Y., and in 1861, to St. Andrews church, in Ann Arbor. His work among the students was so indefatigable and effective that, combined with his eminent abilities, it attracted wide attention. He was a member of the standing committee of the Michigan diocese in 1862, and a year later was made secretary. In 1868, he was a member of the general convention and in 1875, Hobard college conferred upon him the degree of S. T. D.

Until 1874 Michigan constituted a single diocese, but as the population increased and new towns were added to the list of parishes to be visited, a division of the diocese became necessary. The general convention consented, and Bishop McCoskry called a meeting of the clergy and laity to meet in St. Mark's church in this city, Dec. 2, 1875, to elect a bishop of the new western Michigan diocese. Rev. George D. Gillespie, of St. Andrews, Ann Arbor, was chosen, and was consecrated in St. Mark's church, Feb. 21, 1875. The ceremonies were most imposing and impressive. Bishop McCoskry acted as consecrating bishop, and was assisted by Bishops Littlejohn, of Long Island; Paddock, of Massachusetts; Talbot of Indiana; Robertson, of Missouri, and Welles, of Wisconsin.

For a number of years Bishop Gillespie was head of the state department of corrections and charities.

Bishop Gillespie was one of our best known and best loved summer residents. The funeral was held at Grand Rapids Tuesday. Major E. H. Green attending from this city.

IN FIVE MINUTES

All Your Indigestion and Stomach Misery Will End

Take your sour stomach—or maybe you call it indigestion, dyspepsia, gastritis or catarrh of stomach; it doesn't matter—take your stomach trouble right with you to your pharmacist and ask him to open a 50c case of Pape's diapepsin and let you eat one 22-grain triangle and see if within five minutes there is left any trace of your stomach misery.

The correct name for your trouble is food fermentation—food souring, the digestive organs become weak, there is lack of gastric juice; your food is only half digested, and you become affected with loss of appetite, pressure and fullness after eating, vomiting, nausea, heartburn, griping in bowels, tenderness in the pit of stomach, bad taste in mouth, constipation, pain in limbs, sleeplessness, belching of gas, biliousness, sick headache, nervousness, dizziness and many other similar symptoms.

If your appetite is tickle, and nothing tempts you, or you belch gas or if you feel bloated after eating, or your food lies like a lump of lead on your stomach, you can make up your mind that at the bottom of all this there is but one cause, fermentation of undigested food.

Prove to yourself, after your next meal, that your stomach is as good as any; that there is nothing really wrong. Stop this fermentation and begin eating what you want without fear of discomfort or misery.

Almost instant relief is waiting for you. It is merely a matter of how soon you take a little diapepsin.

Married in Grand Rapids at the home of the bride's grand parents, Miss Eva M. Pelton, of Central Lake, to Timothy R. Temple, of Columbus, Ohio.

Until recently with the S. Rosenthal & Son department store Petoskey, Miss Pelton has also been employed with the same firm in the millinery department for a number of seasons.

The ceremony was performed by Rev. Godolphin, formerly of Petoskey, at 351 Bates street, the home of T. S. Pelton.

Miss Pelton is the eldest daughter of Mrs. George A. McCartney, formerly of this city, and "Tim Temple" is well known to many here.

THEATRICAL

Senior Play

"Esmeralda," the play to be put on by this year's senior class is not a play which is often given by local talent. "Esmeralda" ran three hundred and fifty nights in the Madison Square Theater of New York and is now being played by many professional companies through the country.

The Sleeping Car, a farce of true merit will be given after the play. This is not the kind that you holler at and quickly forget but it has a deep humor, which one will remember long. The play is progressing finely under the direction of Miss Carley and special orchestra music is being prepared under the supervision of Miss Gregory.

The Question of Local Option

This space will be devoted to the discussion of the question of local option. Only matter which is furnished us by regular representatives of each faction will be used as we see fit. The COURIER is not responsible for anything appearing under this head, nor does it in any way represent the policy of this paper.

BY THE DRYS

The argument used by those favoring the continuance or the saloon in this county and the answers.

LOSS OF REVENUE

A. The county and villages have received from the saloon business $16,500 a year. The citizens of the county who pay for that have spent to maintain the saloon $150,000 a year. $133,000 a year of this has been contributed by the men who carry the dinner pails and our farmers, the balance by our transient, professional and business men.

LOSS OF BUSINESS

A. It is urged that if the saloons go, business goes. What business? How many men in your town will quit work and move their families away because they have no saloons? How many of your farmers will quit selling their products and buying their groceries because there is no saloon? Which will produce greater general good, spend $150,000 in this county for necessaries for living or put it in the bank, or spend it for what is called good times and have that which gives no value in return. What would you do to secure the circulation through any other means of $150,000 a year in the county additional? It simply means an increased market for merchandise and farm products to at least that much value.

LOSS OF TRANSIENT TRADE AND VISITORS

A. Using your best judgement, candid and fair, how many transient people come into any of the communities in the county to buy the liquors they have to sell.

The submission of the proposition is so sudden that it is hardship upon men engaged in the saloon business and they should have time given them to dispose of their property and get out.

A. Local option is ten years old, during that time, and specially the last few years it has been agitated in different sections of the state, and of other states, and any man of ordinary judgement may have known that the business was in danger in any county and he has had this time to protect himself.

The solicitude of the liquor interests for the general welfare.

A. Think carefully and then answer this question. When before in memory has the liquor interest made a campaign for the general welfare upon any other issue, and when you have thought, you will know that the saloon interests have generally refused to contribute for public celebrations on holidays and other public doings, without being first given a tacit permission to run their business in violation of law as a consideration, and upon any other occasion or proposition what has been their attitude towards the general welfare?

Figures shows the decrease in production of alcoholic liquors since the movement for local option and prohibition has begun.

Memorandum of tax gallons of spirits produced in United States for the years 1904 to 1908 inclusive.

1904	131,311,052 gallons
1905	117,810,503.3 gallons
1906	115,666,125.1 gallons
1907	108,573,013.2 gallons
1908	126,989,740.1 gallons

Net decrease in tax gallons of spirits produced in 1908 as compared with 1907 is 41,584,173.1 gallons.

The annual decrease in spirits used as beverages for the year 1908 were as follows:

Bourbon whiskey	18,970,396.7 gallons
Rye	9,962,388.1 gallons
Rum	126,485.1 gallons
Gin	130,964.9 gallons
High wines	74,873 gallons
Cologne spirits	9,888,930.1 gallons
Miscellaneous	3,417,888.8 gallons

Making a total decrease for 1908 in spirits used as beverages of 42,360,918 gallons.

There was an increase production of commercial alcohol due to the enactment for the denatured alcohol law of 725,775.

Memorandum of amounts collected by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the years 1900 to 1908 inclusive.

1900	$236,316,140.57
1901	230,871,920.42
1902	271,867,960.25
1903	230,740,925.23
1904	233,960,761.06
1905	231,187,075.37
1906	219,602,738.10
1907	209,004,922.87
1908	251,005,950.01

1908 collections $17,999,072.81 less than collections of 1907.

Now Mr. Wetman does local option reduce the amount of liquor drinking.

Don't these figures prove to any sensible man that the consumption of liquor has decreased with the passage of prohibitory laws?

LOCAL OPTION PRESS COMMITTEE.

BY THE WETS

Local Option in Minnesota

The following letter addressed to the Voters of Kalkaska County speaks just as plainly to the Voters of Charlevoix County. Mr. Kinney was for many years the manager of the St. Louis Hoop and Stave Company and resided at Rapid City in Kalkaska county. Early in the present winter he signed the petition for the submission of the local option question in Kalkaska county. Since then he has gone to live in a local option community. Read what he has to say.

Huston, Minn. March 1st, 1909.

To the Voters of Kalkaska County.

I will endeavor to give you a little of my ideas of prohibition, and how it is working in our town here.

Now these are facts that I am going to give you that I see with my own eyes, I have no particular interest in Kalkaska county as far as prohibitioo is concerned but I would not like to see the towns in Kalkaska county die, and the towns in Antrim and adjoining counties getting Kalkaska county's money.

I will explain to you how it works here, our town of Huston was voted dry last year, and is supposed to be a dry town, our neighboring towns have from one to three saloons, and as soon as our men get their pay on Saturday afternoon they go to these saloon towns and spend their money, and get what they drink and want, and also what other stuff they want from the stores, where we ought to have the money spent here in the town where it is earned.

Now I will venture to say that there is as much beer drank here as when they had their saloons, but it is not everyone that can get it. There is beer being taken into boarding houses, and private houses every day in barrels and cases, this town suffers a loss of $1,000,000 per year for license which principalty all went into improvements such as side walks, sewers, and streets, they are going to vote on local option again the 9th of this month and it is the opinion of all that local option will be defeated by such a majority that it will not come up again for some time. I hope it is. If I were in Kalkaska county on election day I should vote against prohibition, although I did sign the petition for it, but after seeing how it works I have changed my mind.

Yours Very Truly,

Mgr. St. Louis Hoop and Stave Co.

(signed) Geo. KINNEY.

"Through an agitation which has always had a moral end these immoralities have been developed and made conspicuous. All legislation intended to put restrictions on the liquor traffic, except perhaps the simple tax, is more or less liable to those objections but the prohibitory legislation is the worst of all in those respects. Even when external improvements have undoubtedly been effected by the new legislation it often remains doubtful or at least not demonstrable whether or not the visible improvements have been accompanied by a diminution in the amount of drinking."—Cardinal Gibbons.

"If we want to improve the morality of our cities let the virtue of temperance be proclaimed in the churches and taught in the homes. It cannot be inculcated by restrictive laws.

"I am persuaded that it is practically impossible to put prohibition into effect in any large community and the best means therefore to promote temperance is to limit the number of saloons by high license. Laws like prohibition that are certain to be violated had best not be made, for incessant violation draws down upon them disrespect."—Bishop Henry C. Potter.

"The nations who have prohibited the use of alcoholic beverages, like the Turks, the Arabs, the Persians and other Mohammedan tribes, are far behind the western nations in everything which makes life worth living."—Bishop Hall of Vermont.

Prohibition drives underground the mischief which it seeks to cure, making it more difficult to deal with the evil, and impossible to regulate the trade, as for instance, in the quality of liquor sold."

"Prohibition has been disastrous to the cause of temperance."—Bishop Clark of Rhode Island.

Dr. Felix Alder of New York: "We are prone to think that every saloon is a place in which temperance is fostered; that drinking and drunkenness are synonymous. That is not the case. The saloon serves many other purposes than that of satisfying the drink habit, and some of these purposes are perfectly legitimate. Above all, the saloon satisfies that profound craving in human nature for free social intercourse."

Henry Ward Beecher: "If you say to me that I ought not to drink, perhaps I would agree with you. But if you tell me I must not drink I will drink because I have a natural right to do so—to drink what I please."

Rev. Lyman Abbot: "It was not the method of Jesus. He lived in an age of total abstinence societies, but did not join them. He emphasized the distinction between His methods and those of John the Baptist, that John came neither eating nor drinking; the Son of Man came eating and drinking. He condemned drunkeness, but never in a single instance lifted up his voice in condemnation of drinking. On the contrary, He commenced His public ministry by making wine in considerable quantity and of fine quality, and this apparently only to add to the joyous festivities of a wedding."

Rev. W. I. Rainsford, of New York: "To drink is no sin. Jesus Christ drank. To keep a saloon is no sin. And any policy that claims the name of Christ, or does not claim His name, that deals with the well-nigh universal taste of man for alcohol on the basis of law and order alone, cannot commend itself to the best intelligence and is doomed to fail."

HOTEL SELLEY.

GEORGE W. SELLEY, PROPRIETOR

Midland, Mich., March 4, 1909.

Dear Sir:

Your letter of the 3d inst. at hand in regard to local option, you wished to know. I would say that it has had a depression on business generally, especially the hotel business, many farmers going to adjoining towns to do business, and as far as drunkards are concerned there are as many if not more than before local option.

The people of Clare county, if they don't believe this, I will gladly board one from each side of the case for a week, so that they can be convinced for themselves.

Respectfully,

GEORGE W. SELLEY.

MIDLAND COUNTY SAVINGS BANK.

Midland, Mich., March 3, 1909.

Dear Sir:

In answer to yours of the 25th, asking my opinion as to the effect of local option on our city. Would say that up to the spring of 1908, Midland was considered one of the best towns of its size in Michigan, but since the adoption of local option, business has decreased. Merchants are complaining of the depression in business and with one or two exceptions, every business man is opposed to the workings of local option.

Many public improvements that were planned before local option went into effect have now become impossible, owing to the loss of revenue from the liquor licenses.

Empty houses and an era of whiskey, drinking and merchants complaining of poor business is the best description that can be given of Midland's experience with county prohibition.

Your very truly,

STEWART B. GORDON, Mayor.

OLMSTED & SOMERVILLE

DRY GOODS, CLOTHING, HAY AND FEED.

Midland, Mich., February 27, 1909.

Dear Sir:

Your letter of the 26th, received, and in reply to your inquiry as to how local option has affected our town and county, will say that we find our business has fallen off. And a good part of our loss on business is traceable to local option, we think what is true of our business is true of 95 per cent of the business houses in our city not engaged in the sale of whiskey.

Prohibition hurts business here and does not prohibit the sale of whiskey. Whiskey is still sold here, and judging from the number of drunks seen on our streets it is still drank. Local option is not the solution of the liquor question. It has hurt business here, without adding to the moral tone of the community.

Yours truly,

OLMSTEAD & SOMERVILLE.

Per O. C. Sommerville.

Midland, Mich. March 1, 1909.

Dear Sir:

In regard to your inquiry as to the effect of local option in Midland, would say we have been engaged in the draying business in the city of Midland for seven or eight years, and since the closing of the liquor stores in Midland our business has fallen off at least 25 per cent. There are not as many commercial travelers and not as much freight to handle, and our general business has suffered, and we notice in our city that there used to be a class of people coming here to trade who do not come now and we hardly ever see them. We are certain that the closing of the liquor stores has had a serious effect on the business interests of the city.

JOHN WALSH.
WM. H. BOLTON.

WILLIAM P. O'BRIEN.

LAMPS, CHINA, CROCKERY, GLASS AND TINWARE.

Midland, Mich., March 1, 1909.

Replying to yours of recent date would say that I do not consider the local option law a good thing for our town. We not only lose the license money, but we are losing trade, as many farmers haul their produce to and buy their merchandise in wet towns, in Saginaw or Bay county, and people that used too much whiskey before the law went into effect are using too much now. They appear to have no trouble in getting all the whiskey they want.

Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM P. O'BRIEN.

WHAT THE BARBERS SAY.

Midland, Mich., March 1, 1909.

Dear Sir:

We have been in business in Midland about five years and find business not as good since local option, as the farmers do not come to town and the transient trade is not as good.

GLASGOW & GLIDDEN.

Midland, Mich., March 1, 1909.

To My Fellow Barbers:

In regard to local option, I have been running a three chair shop in this city for the last ten years. My trade has been cut from $6 to $10 a week and I am only working one man. The farmers do not come to the city one-half as often as they did when they had a place to go and get warm.

Yours respectfully,

FRANK TEAL.

MYRON J. GUE, ATTORNEY.

Midland, Mich., February 26, 1909.

Replying to your inquiry as to the effect of local option or a dry city, would say, I have lived in Midland for a good many years, during all of which time liquors were dispensed under license law, and we are now under the local option law, and no liquor is sold legally except by drug store. I am firmly of the opinion that it has quite seriously affected the business interests of our city, inasmuch as saloons are open in adjoining counties, and I am satisfied to a moral certainty that a considerable portion of our country people living near the border of the county are not coming to Midland as they did. We have quite a foreign element in our population and many of them are used to the use of liquors, especially beer, and they will, from any observation, go out of the way at times to get a social glass, and there is little question in my opinion but local option has seriously affected the business interests of Midland, and there are many other business men and temperate men who express the same opinion to me.

Respectfully,

M. J. GUE.

HOTEL MADILL.

J. W. MADILL, PROPRIETOR.

Midland, Mich., March 2, 1909.

Dear Sir:

In relation to the condition of the hotel business since May 1, 1908, when local option took effect in this county, would say we have been compelled to let nearly all of our help go and have been running behind ever since. A good many of the traveling men have quit coming to the town, and business has fallen off at least 75 per cent, since the local option took effect. There are as many drunken people on the streets of Midland as before, and it is not an uncommon thing to see minors who would not be sold liquor in a licensed saloon, in an intoxicated condition.

Our merchants complain of loss of trade owing to the large number of farmers who are going to adjoining towns, located in wet counties, to market their crops and purchase their supplies.

We have many German and Polish farmers, the most frugal, temperate and industrious citizens of our county, who refuse to have their personal liberty curtailed, and they are fast finding markets elsewhere.

Very truly yours,

J. W. MADILL,
Proprietor Hotel Madill.

SEEING THE ALPS.

Tourists Who Do Their Mountain Climbing by Telescope.

The tourist of today who visits the Alps and who lacks the physical endurance or whose time is too limited to make the ascent of some of the famous peaks nevertheless is able closely to survey the panorama of mountain scenery through the medium of powerful telescopes located at the terminals of the mountain railroads. By this means the rocks and glaciers and peculiar formations of these historic mountains may be carefully studied, though the spectator need not approach them within many miles.

Each of these mountain telescopes is mounted on a forked cradle and is so nicely balanced that its position may readily be fixed by the tightening of small thumbscrews after the focus has been adjusted with a hand wheel. The magnifying power of the instruments varies from 35 to 110 diameters, but is adapted for landscape observation only.

When weather conditions are suitable, climbers on the Titlis may be seen through the telescope at Fellberg, near Zurich, a distance of forty miles, and the hotel on the Faulhorn, sixty miles away, may be recognized. Every step of the tollers on the slopes of the Matterhorn can be followed by means of the instrument on the Riffelalp above Zermatt. Several lives have been saved by the means of these glasses, for signals of distress on the mountains are seen by the watchers at the telescopes.—Harper's.

A Birdseye View.

The following incident occurred during a terrific thunderstorm at the home of a contractor who lives in the vicinity of Tampa, Fla. The contractor and his family were sitting on the veranda watching the storm when a bolt of lightning struck a tree not fifteen feet from where they were sitting.

The shock was terrific, but no one was injured, although they were all badly frightened. The young son, with great excitement, was telling that he jumped two feet high.

"How do you know you jumped so high?" said his father.

"Why," said Johnnie, "I looked down while I was up."—Youth's Companion.

Sacks Which Grow on Trees.

From a species of Antiarus—the genus which includes the upas tree—sacks are made in western India by the following singular process: A branch is cut corresponding to the length and diameter of the sack wanted. It is sucked a little and then beaten with clubs till the fiber separates from the wood. This done, the sacks formed of the bark is turned inside out and pulled down till the wood is sawed off, with the exception of a small piece left to form the bottom of the sack.

wolen he lay a fiery furnace; it gave metho.; to his every word and look. He took up the difficult part and, after the superficial anguish dulled, complained no more and successfully counterfeited cheerfulness and betterment. He said nothing of the curiously recurrent and sickening stab of pain, searching and deep seated, that took his breath and left each time an increasing giddiness. Whatever inner hurt this might betoken, he must hide it the sooner to leave the hospital, where each hour brought nearer the inevitable disclosure.

He thanked fortune now for the chapel game. Few enough in Anlston would care to see the unfrocked, disgraced rector of St. James'. He did not know that the secret was Bishop Ludlow's own until the hour when he opened his eyes after a fitful sleep upon the latter's face.

The bishop was the first visitor, and it was his first visit, for he had been in a distant city at the time of the fire. Waiting the waking, he had been mystified at the change a few months had wrought in the countenance of the man whose disappearance had cost him so many sleepless hours. The months of indulgence and rich living—on the money he had won from Harry—had taken away Hugh's slightness, and his fuller cheeks were now of the contour of Harry's own. But the bishop distinguished new lines in the face on the pillow, an expression unfamiliar and puzzling. The firmness and strength were gone, and in their place was a haunting something that gave him a flitting suggestion of the discrowned that he could not shake off.

Waking, the unexpected sight of the bishop startled Hugh. To the good man's pain he had turned his face away.

"My dear boy," the bishop had said, "they tell me you are stronger and better. I thank God for it!"

He spoke gently and with deep feeling. How could he tell to what extent he himself, in mistaken severity, had been responsible for that unaccustomed look? When Hugh did not answer the bishop misconstrued the silence. He leaned over the bed. The big cool hand touched the fevered one on the white coverlid, where the ruby ring glowed, a coal in snow.

"Harry," he said, "you have suffered—you are suffering now. But think of me only as your friend.—I ask no questions. We are going to begin where we left off."

"I would like to do that," said Hugh, "to begin again. But the chapel is gone."

"Never mind that," said the bishop cheerfully. "You are only to get well. We are going to rebuild soon, and we want your judgment on the plans. Anlston is longing on your condition, Harry," he went on. "There's a small cartload of visiting cards downstairs for you. But I imagine you haven't begun to receive yet, eh?"

"I—I've seen nobody." Hugh spoke hurriedly and hoarsely. "Tell the doctor to let no one come—no one but you. I—I'm not up to it."

"Why, of course not," said the bishop quickly. "You need quiet, and the people can wait."

The bishop chatted awhile of the parish. Hugh replying only when he must, and went away heartened. Before he left Hugh saw his way to hasten his own going. On the next visit the seed was dropped in the bishop's mind so cleverly that he thought the idea his own. That day he said to the surgeon in charge:

"He is gaining so rapidly I have been wondering if he couldn't be taken away where the climate will benefit him. Will he be able to travel soon?"

"I think so," answered the surgeon. "We suspected internal injury at first, but I imagine the worst he has to fear is the disfigurement. Mountain or sea air would do him good," he added reflectively. "What he will need is tonic and building up."

The bishop had revolved this in his mind. He knew a place on the coast, tucked away in the cypresses, which would be admirable for convalescence. He could arrange a special car, and he himself could make the journey with him. He proposed this to the surgeon and with his approval put his plan in motion. In two days more Hugh found his going fully settled.

The idea admirably fitted his necessity. The spot the bishop had selected was quiet and retired and, more, was near the port at which he could most readily take ship for South America. Only one reflection made him shiver—the route lay through the town of Smoky Mountain. Yet who would dream of looking for a fugitive from the law in the secluded car that carried a sick man? The risk would be small enough, and it was the one way open.

On the last afternoon before the departure Hugh asked for the clothes he had worn when he was brought to the hospital, found the gold pieces he had snatched in the burning chapel and tied them in a handkerchief about his neck. They would suffice to buy his sea passage. The one red counter he had kept—it was from henceforth to be a reminder of the good resolutions he had made so long ago—he slipped into a pocket of the clothes he was to wear away, a suit of loose, comfortable tweed.

Waiting restlessly for the hour of his going Hugh asked for the newspapers. Since the first he had had them read to him each day, listening fearfully for the hue and cry. But today the surgeon put his request aside.

"After you are there," he said, "if Bishop Ludlow will let you. Not now. You are almost out of my clutches, and I must tyrannize while I can."

A quick look passed from him to his assistant as he spoke, for the newspapers that afternoon had worn startling headlines. The sordid affairs of a mining town across the ranges had little interest for Anlston, but the names of Sikes and Moreau on the clicking wire had waked it thus late to the sensation. The professional caution of the tinker of human bodies wished, however, that no excitement should be added to the unavoidable fatigue of his patient's departure.

This fatigue was near to spelling defeat, after all, for the exertion brought again the dreadful stabbing pain, and this time it carried Hugh into a region where feeling ceased, consciousness passed and from which he struggled back finally to find the surgeon bending anxiously over him.

"I don't like that shaking spell," the latter confided to his assistant an hour later as they stood looking through the window after the receding carriage. "It was too pronounced. Yet he has complained of no pain. He will be in good hands at any rate." He tapped the glass meaningly with his forefinger. "It's curious," he said after a pause, "I always liked Sanderson—in the pulpit. Somehow he doesn't appeal to me at close range."

The special car which the bishop had ready had been made a pleasant interior. Fern boxes were in the corners, a caged canary swung from a bracket, and a softly cushioned couch had been prepared for the sick man. A moment before the start, as it was being coupled to the rear of the resting train, while the bishop chatted with the conductor, a flustered messenger boy handed him a telegram. It read:

I arrive Anlston tomorrow 5. Confidential. Must see you. Urgent.
JESSICA.

The bishop read it in some perplexity. It was the first word he had received from her since her marriage; but, aware of Hugh's forgery and disgrace, he had not wondered at this. The newspapers today pictured a still worse shame for her in the position of the man who in the name still was her husband, who had trod so swiftly the downward path from thievery to the worst of crimes. Could Jessica's coming have to do with that? He must see her, yet his departure could not now be delayed. He consulted with the conductor, and the latter pored over his tablets.

As a result his answering message flashed along the wires to Jessica's faraway train:

Sanderson injured. Taking him to coast train 48 due Twin Peaks 2 tomorrow afternoon.

And thus the fateful moment approached when the great appeal should be made.

ROADMAKING WITH SAWDUST.

Sand Used as a Mixer by Minnesota Highway Engineer.

A road made from sand and sawdust is the latest style of roadmaking designed by George W. Cooley, state highway engineer in Minnesota. Last spring he made a section of road with clover and rye on a sand foundation. This has been very successful. The road made from sand and sawdust is at Cambridge, in Isanti county, Minn.

Four inches of sawdust were raked on the sand road after being graded. This was worked into the sand by passing teams, and as fast as ruts were formed the sawdust was raked into the ruts, to be further mixed with sand. This is a new roadmaking material and if successful will make an exceedingly profitable means of using the immense quantities of sawdust from the mills of the state.

In those counties where there is nothing but sand in the roads good roads are impossible without the addition of other material. Mr. Cooley is now experimenting with various means of turning the sand into vegetable loam, which can be worked to advantage. The idea is that the sawdust will rot and, mixing with the sand, will form a loam suitable for making good roads with.

Such a small amount of money is appropriated by the state for the construction of roads that the experiments have been on a limited scale and the construction of roads proceeds slowly. Minnesota spends only one-tenth as much on state roads as does New York in relation to the value of the property.

GOOD ROAD MATERIAL

Best In the World Scattered Throughout United States.

IS DUSTLESS AND DURABLE.

American Delegate to International Highway Congress Says Large Deposits of Asphaltum Rock Give Country Great Improvement Chance.

The people of the United States have ready at their hand the best roadmaking material in the world. Deposits of it are scattered throughout the country so that it cannot be "cornered," and its use will bring a dustless era, combined with safety for horses and automobiles.

These are some of the conclusions of Howard H. Gross, one of the four United States commissioners to the International good roads congress at Paris, who recently returned. Mr. Gross is an enthusiast on roads and is preparing to put his observations to good use in acquainting the American people with the results of experiments abroad and the opportunities which lie at their own doors.

"I have found while abroad that we have more to learn of Great Britain than of France regarding the building of modern roads," said Mr. Gross to a representative of the Chicago Post. "France has enjoyed a reputation in the past for having the best roads in the world, but they are wearing out under the strain of automobile traffic, and comparatively little new work is being done. In Great Britain, however, they are taking up the task with modern, up to date methods and are conducting experiments which will be of value to every country.

"Everywhere the difficulty is the same—the automobile riddles the pavement, the tires lifting out the fine particles which compose the surface of the macadam road, leaving the rough stone. Therefore the English have adopted the new plan of increasing the size of the crushed stone in the top of the pavement just before the top dressing, or binder, as it is called, is added.

"Instead of having the stone an inch or an inch and a half in diameter the size is increased to two or two and a half inches and sometimes three. There are three methods of top dressing. One is to apply the coal tar products in a heated condition; a better one is the use of an asphaltum mixture, and the third and best is the use of a natural granulated asphaltum rock.

"The asphaltum rock is crushed and spread over the surface, being rolled until it fills the spaces between the stones and the inequalities of the surface. The stone shows on the surface, making a gritty hold for horses' shoes in slippery weather and eliminating to a large extent the skidding of automobiles. It does not crumble into dust like the ordinary macadam pavement and is more durable than any other road material.

"In the United States we have large deposits of rock containing from 7 to 9 per cent of asphaltum—in Tennessee, Kentucky, Oklahoma, Texas, Utah and California. Thus the material is spread all over the country. It is not controlled by any patent and would be a hard thing to corner. A road built on this plan would last for years. It would cost probably 25 cents a square yard more than macadam, but would more than make up for the initial expense in the cheapness of maintenance. The dustless feature alone is worth the difference in cost."

Studying the practical aspects of road building abroad, Mr. Gross has found that government aid has been the plan generally adopted in Europe. He has found also what he considers ample reasons for the United States government doing the same thing, with a measure of assistance from the states themselves. Furthermore, he holds that the conditions of the country's roads is a matter of universal concern and should be left entirely to the farmers of each locality when payment of the initial cost is provided for.

"The country roads are part of the nation's mighty system of transportation," he declared. "When the roads are bad every one feels the results in the cost of the articles on his table and practically everything else he uses.

"The tax on the individual purse, both rural and urban, extends to the cost of running the national government. The postal department uses 40 per cent of the roads of the country for rural delivery. It has been stated semiofficially that the expense of this service is augmented 20 per cent by the state of the highways. Now the postoffice department expends every year $35,000,000 on rural delivery. Twenty per cent of this is $7,000,000, all waste, which would go a long way in paying the interest on an issue of low interest government bonds issued for road building."

A clearing house for information will be established in Chicago, where every one interested in good roads can secure the latest and best information regarding experiments and experience both in the United States and abroad. It is likely that a good roads bill will be submitted to the general assembly this winter providing for state aid, and Mr. Gross believes that the farmers of the state are ready to give it their hearty support.

The teacher was drilling her little pupils in the meaning of words and requested them to form sentences containing the words "bitter end." Promptly a little girl submitted this: "The dog chased the cat under the piazza and bit her end."

He Didn't Say It.

He was a good little boy, and he lived not many miles from Boston. He never disobeyed his mother, he never called her names when her orders were not his wishes, and he had the face of an angel. Next door lived little Rosy, a girl who proved the proverb about small pitchers. One day Harry was allowed to go over to play with Rosy, but with strict orders not to take off his hat and coat to go in the house if Rosy could not come out into the yard.

Rosy could not come out, but would not Harry take off his things and play inside? Harry quoted sadly his mother's injunction.

"Your mamma is a silly," said Rosy crossly.

Harry went home and told his mother what Rosy had said. "She is a very naughty little girl," his mother declared. "You must never say such a word."

"No, mamma, I won't," said the dutiful Harry.

A few days later he was again forbidden to do something which he greatly desired to do. "Mamma," said he, lifting to hers his angelic face, "do you remember what Rosy said about you?"—New York Tribune.

True bravery is shown by performing without witness what one might be capable of doing before all the world.—La Rochefoucauld.

Courier Grange Column

Five Hundred Charlevoix County Patrons Will go to Traverse City in 1909

South Arm Grange No. 815.

South Arm grange No. 815 met in regular session Saturday evening, March 20. All officers present except assistant steward.

There was no business transacted.

After recess Maude Crowell, Emmice Liskum, David Bashaw, Erwin Murphy and Claude Johnson were initiated in the third and fourth degrees. The grange then sat down to an elegant supper.

After a recess lecturer's hour was carried out with songs, a recitation and a discussion. What should be done to the East Jordan creamery to make it a benefit to the farmers? It was thoroughly discussed by a few of the brothers, two of the speakers being stock holders. Moved, supported and carried that it is the sense of the grange that the change should be made in the farmers and not in the creamery.

Grange closed in form. Thirty-three members and fourteen visitors present. One application for membership was received.

ORGANIZATION COMPLETED

Of Intermediate Valley Fruit Growers Association March 12.

The Intermediate Valley Fruit Growers association met in the court house at Bellaire March 12 and completed its organization, permanently adopting the name which has been used in preliminary organization.

The membership in the organization numbers fifty-six, with a large amount of stock paid in.

Officers were elected as follows: President, R. E. Morrow, Central Lake; secretary, C. S. Guile, Bellaire; treasurer, W. J. Dewey, Forest Home; standing committees were appointed to take the lead in the various divisions of the work.

It was decided to hold the next meeting in Central Lake on Friday, April 30.

Says Home-Made Mixture is Easily Prepared and Cures Weak Kidneys and Bladder

Here is a simple home-made mixture as given by an eminent authority on kidney diseases, who makes the statement that it will relieve almost any case of kidney trouble if taken before the stage of Bright's disease. He states that such symptoms as lame back, pain in the side, frequent desire to urinate, especially at night, painful and discolored urination, are readily overcome. Here is the recipe. Try it:

Fluid extract dandelion, one-half ounce; compound kargon, one ounce; compound syrup sarsaparilla, three ounces. Take a teaspoonful after each meal and at bedtime.

A well-known druggist here in town is authority that these ingredients are all harmless and easily mixed at home by shaking well in a bottle. This mixture has a peculiar healing and soothing effect upon the entire kidney and urinary structure, and often overcomes the worst forms of rheumatism in just a little while. This mixture is said to remove all blood disorders and cure the rheumatism by forcing the kidneys to filter and strain from the blood and system all uric acid and foul, decomposed waste matter, which cause these afflictions. Try it if you aren't well. Save the prescription.

Mrs. A. M. Ross was Called by Death Sunday

Came to Charlevoix in 1854—Leaves Six Children

Mrs. A. M. Ross, an old resident of this county, died at her home in Charlevoix township, Sunday, March 21, after a long illness.

Mary Ann Cunningham, daughter of the late Tomas Cunningham, of Marion township, was born in Rawdon, Canada, July 15, 1839. In 1860 she was married to A. M. Ross, who survives her, at South Hampton, Canada, coming to Charlevoix in 1864, where they have since resided. She was the mother of eight children, six of whom are living, two daughters, Mrs. Frank Reed and Mrs. W. H. Cooper of Charlevoix, and four sons, A. T. Ross of Charlevoix, A. W. Ross, of Clarion, Ia. O. and George Ross of this city, all of whom were present at the funeral, which was held at the house Wednesday, Rev. H. A. Putnam, of the Congregational church, of which she had long been a member, officiating. Burial took place at Brookside.

The members of the township boards are requested to remember that the COURIER office is fully equipped for the printing of ballots for the spring election. Send us in the tickets nominated and the number wanted. We'll do the rest.

For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. HUSKING FROM THE SHOCK.

Suggestions For Saving Labor and Quick Work.

For those who husk out fodder the accompanying idea for saving much stooping and hastening the work of husking will be a good one to put into operation. The plan is to use two sawhorses of a height suitable to the work in hand or just high enough so that one does not have to stoop over in husking out the ears as they hang from the stalks as they lie crossways on the two sawhorses. The horses can be made of 2 by 4 and 1 by 6 material and should not be too heavy, as it makes hard carrying. Most persons will be surprised how much easier it is to husk shocked fodder this way. An armful of stalks can be laid across the sawhorse, and the ears will hang down, and one can husk nearly as fast as if he were husking standing corn. It is of course expected that the wagon be driven along so as to be right at hand for tossing in the corn as fast as it is husked. As soon as one armful is husked out it can be thrown back and another placed on the horses, and by working this way more corn can be husked out and with less effort than any other way known.

In connection with this plan here is another suggestion. Secure two 2 by 4's about eight feet long, good stock. Attach these to the bottom of the wagon box, allowing the ends to extend out on the side of the wagon from which the corn is thrown in. The 2 by 4 nearest the rear of the wagon may be placed so as to just clear the front of the hind wheel, but in attaching the one forward it must be placed sufficiently back of the front wheel to allow turning. The 2 by 4's can generally be attached to the steps of the wagon by chains or clamps such as are used in clamping a colter to the beam of a walking plow. The protruding 2 by 4's, it will be seen, form a support very similar to that made by the sawhorses, and on this support an armful of fodder can be thrown and husked out with the same ease and rapidity that it could be on the sawhorse. The wagon of course should always be stopped so that it will be convenient to the shock. This plan has the advantage of not having to carry anything from one shock to another.

LOST FERTILITY OF SOIL

Some of the Errors of Many Western Farmers.

As a general thing farmers seldom are concerned about the fertility of their soils so long as they raise good crops. But just as soon as the crops show decided signs of failing they begin to "get busy" in restoring the lost fertility. This is about on a parallel with locking the stable after the horse has been stolen.

It would be far more profitable and considerably easier to conserve the fertility than to endeavor to restore it after it has been lost.

For years it has been the boast of parts of the west that the fertility of the soil in those sections was so strong that no manure was needed. But it seems that today there is trouble brewing. An expert says:

"In many sections of the corn belt the day has come when farmers need to pay more attention to maintaining the fertility of the soil. This they should have done years ago. They should have learned the lesson nature taught the farmers in the east and south before the fertile prairies of the west were opened to cultivation. That they did not profit by the experience of eastern and southern farmers—namely, that continuous grain culture and continuous neglect of conserving farmyard manure and applying it regularly and in the most economical manner to their soils—is evident from the present lack of fertility in many of the corn belt states, where the soils at one time were so productive as to lead people to think that their exhaustion was practically an impossibility."

It is pertinent also to here refer to the trials conducted by the Cornell agricultural station to demonstrate the losses to stable manure when exposed to leaching and weathering. A pile of manure that contained elements worth $5.48 after being exposed for five months was worth only $2.03. Leaving manure in piles in the field is an antiquated method that should never be practiced for the reason that it results in fertilizing the spots where the heaps lie too heavily, giving them fully three times as much of the fertilizing elements as they need, while three times as much ground receives less than it needs or not enough to make a showing. Where manure is allowed to lie in heaps on a field for a few weeks or a month it is an impossibility to spread it so as to get an even distribution of organic matter and of the elements of fertility. It is preferable to spread the manure direct from the wagon with a fork, although this is by no means an up to date way of handling it. For the most economical results manure should be hauled direct from the barn as soon as it is made and scattered over the fields by means of a spreader. In this way, and in this way only, can the full value of manure be saved, provided, of course, enough bedding is used in the barn to nicely absorb all the liquid excrement, the plant food of which amounts to nearly one-half of the total in the manure and liquid excrement.

Carefully conducted experiments show that the manure produced per thousand pounds of live weight of the following classes of farm animals is valued at from $25 to $60 per head per year. The valuations given are as follows: For cows, $29; horses, $27; sheep, $5; cattle, $24; pigs, $9. This valuation takes into consideration only the actual amounts of nitrogen, phosphorus and potassium contained in the manure from these animals, valued in accordance with the present prices of these constituents in the form of commercial manures or fertilizers. It does not take into consideration the value of the manure as a humus builder due to its large organic matter content. From this it should be plain to any one that the economical handling of farm manure is one of the very important factors in maintaining the fertility of our soils.

STRONG TICKET IS NAMED

By the Republicans of Charlevoix For Coming Election.

CAPTAIN O. E. WILBUR AT THE HEAD

Ellsworth Dutton for Clerk, John Cook for Treasurer

Strong Men Named for Ward Positions—Resolutions Which Were Adopted

Mayor—Oscar E. Wilbur.
Clerk—Ellsworth Dutton.
Treasurer—John Cook.
Justice of Peace—[Left blank.]

FIRST WARD
Supervisor—Fred J. Meech.
Alderman—Robert W. Paddock.
Constable—Daniel G. Livingston.

SECOND WARD
Supervisor—Harvey Lee Iddings.
Alderman—Warren J. Rachow.
Constable—John Miller.

THIRD WARD
Alderman—Edward B. Ward.
Constable—George Brown.

Above is the result of the Republican ward caucus and city convention. The first ward caucus was presided over by W. E. Hampton, secretary.

A. L. Coulter was chairman in the second ward, N. R. Washburn secretary, L. E. Benton was chairman of the third ward caucus, R. W. Kane secretary.

The city convention was presided over by F. J. Meech, Wilbur A. Cline secretary. The only contest was over the nomination for clerk, Mr. Dutton winning over H. C. Cooper by a vote of 8 to 7.

The following resolutions were presented and adopted.

Whereas, at the annual election to be held in the City of Charlevoix on the 5th day of April next, the question of local option in the county will be submitted to the electors.

And whereas, it is the sense of this caucus that each and every elector should be free to vote his convictions on this question regardless of party affiliation or partisan influence.

Therefore be it resolved, by the electors of the Republican party in caucus assembled that the issue of local option is not involved in the nomination of the candidates of the party for ward and city offices and shall not be an issue in the party campaign at such election.

Whereas, the City of Charlevoix expends yearly from $50,000 to $55,000 all of which involves a large amount of book-keeping. Therefore, be it resolved by the Republicans of the City of Charlevoix, that the city council be requested to reduce the city clerk's salary to a nominal sum not exceeding $200.00 and that a suitable ordinance be enacted providing for the hiring of a competent book-keeper, at a reasonable salary, by the common council and the board of public works, acting jointly and that the term of office of said book-keeper be at the pleasure of the common council and board of public works, acting joining.

The last resolution was also adopted by the labor party.

CANDIDATES ARE NAMED

For the Various City and Ward Office.

By the Labor Party, Caucus Wednesday Night

The labor party made their nomination for city officers Wednesday night.

The city caucus was held in the lower room of the Charlevoix theater block. Captain Plum, chairman and Rollie L. Lewis, secretary. The following ticket was nominated unanimously: Mayor, S. M. Rose; clerk, Rollie L. Lewis; treasurer, endorsed John Cook; justice, W. H. Collins; H. C. Plum, Henry Sherman and Sam Brown were chosen as the city committee.

The first ward caucus was presided over by Henry Sherman, William Taylor secretary. The following ward ticket was named: Supervisor, F. J. Meech; alderman, Archie McNeill; constable, Grover Genelt.

Captain Plum was chairman in the second, Mr. Green, secretary.

The ticket which was named unanimously follows: Supervisor, Charles Zeitler; alderman, Joseph Smith; constable, Charles Hyers.

In the third ward Sam Brown wielded the gavel and John Burns the pen and the following ticket was named: Supervisor, W. H. Miller; alderman, Amos Webster; constable, Sam Hamilton.

The nominees for city officers are all holders of the position which they seek and ask the suffrage of the voters on their conduct of their official positions the past year.

Archie McNeill, candidate for alderman in the first, demonstrated his vote getting qualities last year when he came within one vote of defeating F. J. Meech for supervisor.

Charles Zeitler and Joseph Smith second ward nominees are both up for re-election and will run on their records.

W. H. Miller, candidate for supervisor in the third, is so strong a candidate that he will have no opposition. Amos Webster for alderman has previously served the city in that position and was conceded to be one of the strongest members of that body.

LETTER AND TELEGRAM

Two More Arguments Used by the Wets Refuted.

In answer to the charge of the "wets" that resorters will not come to Charlevoix if it goes dry, we publish the following extract from a letter just received by A. H. Reinhart from J. B. Lord, one of our most prominent summer residents. "In regard to the local option fight I am in hearty sympathy with this and enclose check for $10 made out to E. Stacks, and I hope this will help pay expenses.

In regard to saloons being any attraction to resorters: They will only attract a certain class that will do Charlevoix no good. I think if you want to improve the character of the resorters who go to Charlevoix it will be a great help to have the saloons closed as they are no good whatever on earth, and are a curse where ever located and I hope you will be successful in your fight.

Yours very truly,
J. B. Lord

The wets started a rumor that Van Pelt would not erect his proposed building if the county went dry. In answer to a request from the COURIER VanPelt sent the following telegram:

Chicago, Ill. March 25, '09.
The Courier,
Charlevoix, Mich.

It a lie, The buildiogs go up wet or dry. I am for dry. See telegram to Kane

GEORGE H. VANPELT

The telegram to Mr. Kane was the same in substance and proves that VanPelt is an enthusiastic dry advocate.

FIRE AT BOYNE FALLS

Elwood Saloon Was Destroyed Tuesday of Last Week.

A saloon of Boyne Falls went out of commission last week in a hurry. It caught on fire and burned to the ground in a very few moments and nearly took the lives of three men with it. The saloon was owned by a man named Elwood and was a two story brick veneered building. In addition to a saloon it was a boarding or rooming house. The fire started, so it is claimed, from gasoline which had leaked out of a gasoline stove and run over the floor. When a fire was started in the stove an explosion followed and the building was immediately in flames. The stairway leading to the second story was a mass of flames but two of the three men sleeping above rushed down through the fire and smoke to safety. The third was sleeping in another room and was not awakened until the flames scorched him when he leaped from the bed and through a window on to a cement walk below. He was slightly burned and was also severely bruised by the fall. The building was entirely consumed. Loss said to be about five or six thousand dollars with an insurance of $3,000.

INSANE MAN'S DEED

George Hoopfer of Mancelona Kills Wife and Child.

Attempts Suicide—Murder Took Place Monday Morning.

Sleeping with her baby on her left arm, Mrs. George Hoopfer was sent into eternity Monday morning by a blow from a stick of wood in the hands of her crazed husband. A second later, the innocent little child, warned by either the tremor that shot through the frame of the mother at her dissolution or by some ot providence, slightly raised itself and it too was sent into eternity. To complete the awful crime, the husband and father then took a keen woodman's axe and carefully chopped the head from off the mother and partially severed that of the babe. He was arrested by Sheriff Kittle and taken to Bellaire for a hearing. Hoopfer made two attempts at suicide, one with a knife and the other by hanging but was unsuccessful.

This is what Hoopfer told a reporter standing in the room with the corpses.

"As my wife laid in my arms last night, we talked of our troubles, and she said that it would be better if we all died together. I agreed with her and as I laid there, I made my plans. This morning, I killed them. It was better so.

"We quarrelled every once in a while and our quarrels were bitter. We would have an awful quarrel and then she'd turn away and cry. By and by, I'd cry too, and then we'd make up, but it was no use, we'd quarrel again. Rather than live that way, it was better that we all should die." The man wept bitterly as he told the story.

After killing his wife and child, Hoopfer took a jack knife and cut a great gash in the right side of his throat. "The knife was too dull and it wouldn't go in easily," he said, "So I gave it up."

Hoopfer then went to the barn where there is a ladder leaning up to the loft. Ascending this, he tied a rope to the top rung and then jumped off. There was too much slack, however and he was not injured.

With the blood streaming from the wound in his neck and dyeing his shirt and exposed neck, Hoopfer went to the farm of Ed. Ebenstein a neighbor. Appalled and frightened at the horrible appearance of the man, Ebenstein was compelled to go to the cemetery, with him. There, Hoopfer picked out a place where he wanted to be buried with his family. Then he left Ebenstein and returned home. Ebenstein sounded a general alarm, summoning the officers from Bellaire.

Hoopfer is fifty one year's of age, Mrs. Hoopfer was thirty-two and the baby would have been two years old in September.

DAKIN-KNIGHT

AN EFFECTIVE WORKER

Is Representative Pearson in Legislature

After visiting Detroit, C. J. Herron and Frank McWain took a run over to Lansing last week to pay a visit to Representative W. J. Pearson and see how the law makers work. They found Pearson heels over head at work to defeat the Drinsbee liquor bill, which was a pet measure of the liquor interests. It was a close call for those who favor local option instead of a substitute law and it required the most strenuous work on the part of the temperance members to defeat it.

The Capitol was full of liquor men and their agents and attorneys who felt the need of passing the law to stem the local option sentiment. Mr. Herron tells the Journal that Mr. Pearson has been doing some very effective work in the House of Representatives and that in all he undertakes he digs into with all his energy the same as he has always done in his private affairs and in public matters in which he has been engaged. Mr. Pearson is a quiet worker but already has gained a reputation for successful work—Boyne City Journal.

NATIONAL BOYS' CITY

Will Probably be Established at Charlevoix

Twelve Hundred to Two Thousand Boys Will be Present

In all probability Charlevoix will be made the national headquarters for a Boys' City, a site having been chosen at Mt. McSauba. A corporation has been formed for the establishment of the city here offered as follows:

President—Rev. Mr. McPherson, Chicago.

Vice president—Judge F. W. Mayne, Charlevoix.

Secretary—C. B. Hahn, Salt Lake City.

It is the intention to have from twelve hundred to two thousand boys here next summer. The advantages of the establishment here cannot be over estimated in the amount of advertising it would bring to Charlevoix as a city, as well as the great work which it would do for the boys. The plan is a very interesting one and only lack of space prevents us going into it more fully this week, but we will give the plan in full later.

DROPPED DEAD

George Nowland Taken Suddenly Sunday Afternoon.

George Nowland, and old resident of this city, dropped dead of heart disease, Sunday. Mr. Nowland had been a resident of this city for thirty-six years. He leaves a family of ten children, six boys and four girls, five of whom are residents of this city, Minoie, Blanche, Vera, Clare and Raymond.

The funeral was held at the Congregational church to-day. Rev. H. A. Putnam, officiating. Burial at Brookside.

COMING AGAIN

MURDER AT ASYLUM

Terrible Deed of Alexander Ferguson

While Suffering From an Attack of Acute Mania

Isaac Fuller, forty-five years old, a patient at the Northern Michigan Insane asylum, was killed shortly after 4 o'clock Friday afternoon by Alex. Ferguson, a fellow-patient, in the yards of the institution. Death was instantaneous. Ferguson used a piece of a limb from a tree in the asylum orchard to carry out his deed.

Ferguson and Fuller entered the institution several months ago and were believed to have entirely recovered from their mental derangement. They had been great chums, it being said by attaches that where you would find one you would find the other. Friday afternoon they were assigned to work in the orchard trimming trees. Thirty men, all "trusties," including Ferguson and Fuller, were placed in charge of George Newman, an attendant.

The inmates had been working about two hours when Ferguson crept up to Fuller, whose back was turned, and dealt him a terrific blow over the head with a part of limb which he had cut in two with his ax. Fuller dropped to the ground. Newman, seeing what his charge had done, rushed to his side but was too late to prevent another blow being struck. An examination revealed that the first one had been fatal.

Fuller was carried to the asylum morgue and Ferguson locked up in one of the institution cells. An inquest will be held Saturday morning.

"He talked about me, so I killed him. I had to do it to defend myself," muttered Ferguson after being confined. "He told lies and the only thing I could do was to get rid of him. No, I'm not a bit sorry; I'm glad," he continued.

Dr. Munson, head of the asylum, made an examination of Ferguson's mental condition after the crime, and states that the man was suffering from acute mania.

Fuller's home was in Oceana county and Ferguson's in Charlevoix. Both had entered of their own accord. The former had suffered from melancholia, while Ferguson had been addicted to the excessive use of alcohol.

Ferguson was released February 20, the asylum authorities pronouncing him cured. He was unable to find work in his home county and returned to Traverse City this week and was given a home at the institution for the remainder of the winter. At that time he complained of certain lumber jacks teasing him for having been an asylum inmate This is believed to have been partially the cause for the second attack of insanity.

Both men had once been married but divorced their wives.

Ferguson, the authorities declare, will not be tried for his crime, but will be kept in solitary confinement and under guard for the remainder of his life.

J. Leahy the optician will again be at Baker's Inn Friday, April 9, and will remain until Sunday evening. He makes a specialty of fitting children's eyes. 12-t-2

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

In Regard to the Workings of County Road Law

EVERY TOWNSHIP IS BENEFITED

What is Required to Receive State Reward

Value of Every Foot of Land in Charlevoix Would be Increased—Country and City Equally the Gainers

Does this new county road law infringe upon the township road laws?

Not in least. Suppose the supervisors select one of the main travelled roads in the county and designate this road as as a county road: the property of the entire county including city and villages will be assessed for building so many miles of this road as in the supervisors' judgement it is feasible to do the following year. The tax is assessed on the property in the county at large and appears on each tax receipt under the heading "County Road tax." Local or highway tax on the property abutting this road is collected as formerly and paid into the highway funds to be expended on other roads in other parts of the township, therefore the adjoining roads will receive an added help by reason of these county roads. Remember, however that the county at large is assessed to keep up these county roads, and no expense in doing this falls directly upon those adjacent to these roads.

How many miles will be built each year?

No one can tell. It is up to the supervisors, but under the cash reward law not more than two miles will be built in any township in any one year on any one line. This provision was made so that the various townships would not have to wait until the end of time before enjoying some of the benefits to be derived. This is an excellent feature.

You speak of this cash reward law?

Well, this law is seperate and apart from the county road law, but acts as a supplementary, enabling all who work under the county road law to take advantage of meriting a reward for every mile of county road built, providing these roads comply with the conditions of the reward law, which law specifies just how a road shall be built to receive this reward from the state. Every county, however, is the gainer by accepting the provisions of this law. Every mile of road built in Manistee county since the adoption of this law was built under the required specification and the county has received over $9,000 from the state. All their roads under improvement are being built with the same object in view, state reward.

What are the required specifications of which you speak?

The law is very plain on this point and I will point you to it: Sec. 103, as follows: "For every mile of well-graded road on which the steepest incline shall not exceed six per cent and the width of which shall not be less than 18 feet between side ditches and which shall be properly drained, and have a wagon way or travel track not less than nine feet wide, and which shall consist of not less than eight inches of compacted gravel which must be applied in not less than two layers, each layer to be rolled seperately: Provided, that both shoulders and metalled track shall be properly crowned so as to shed water quickly to the side ditches shall merit, if approved by the state highway commissioner, a reward from the state of $500 a mile and pro rata for extra miles and fractions thereof in excess of the first mile."

Under the same section is a provision for a reward of $250 per mile, also one for $750 per mile and one for $1,000 per mile. This latter applies to a macadam or stone road.

The fact is, however, that the greater number of applications made are for gravel road meriting $500 per mile. You will notice the law says, "not less than nine feet wide for a wagon way or travel track." Nine feet wide is too narrow for most roads. They should

There is more catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. DON'T BE TOO CLEVER.

Man Fight Shy of the Intellectual Woman.

Why are so many clever girls unmarried? Is it because the mere man has his own conceit and naturally does not wish to be overridden by his wife? Perhaps he wants people to consult his opinion and not appeal to his wife for everything.

Then, too, a man does not fancy the possession of a clever wife in his home. Of that abode he must be the chief head, and for a wife to be continually thrusting her cleverness down his throat would be very unpleasing to the average husband.

Men fight shy of the clever girl as a wife, and, after all, surely in many cases it is her own fault. You can be clever without obtruding your views upon other people. They will find out your attainments for themselves without your indirectly telling them of your wonderful stores of knowledge. But it is not fair to confuse the would be bluestocking with the girl who has taken up some special line and tried to perfect herself in that direction only.

Thus, to sum me in a nutshell, it is only the obtrusively all around clever girl that finds herself outside the pale of love's domain.

The clever girl fails to attract men in her home life. A womanly woman is a man's ideal, and the girl who can take a servant's place in the kitchen or look after the little ones in the nurse's absence appeals far more to a man than the woman who could take the chair at a scientific meeting.

So be warned, and if you want to crown your life with the greatest of all happiness—a man's love—don't let him know that you are overclever.

We speak of saints and enthusiasts for good as if some special gifts were made to them in middle age which are withheld from other men. Is it not rather that some few souls keep alive the lamp of zeal and high desire which God lights for most of us while life is young.—Mrs. Ewing.

The most popular people during the last decade of the nineteenth century were the people who had had influenza and so could discuss it in all its various stages, but whose recorded temperature had always kept one degree lower than the temperature of those with whom they conversed. There is a subtle flattery in a slight inferiority of temperature which even sanctified human nature cannot resist.

The common lot is the best thing that this life has to offer, and, luckily for us, the best of us are fit for nothing better, since there is nothing better this side of heaven.—Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler.

NOVEL FAVOR GIVING.

Presents Tied in Packages and Fastened to Umbrella Ribs.

Mothers in search of new stunts for giving favors at a child's party should not omit the umbrella method. This is as easily managed as a pie or grab bag and is much more picturesque.

Cover an old silk umbrella with gay pictures and festoon it with strips of bright tissue paper or colored ribbons. The handle can also be twined with colored muslin, though it should be done very tightly to keep taut under youthful vigor in handling. Small sleigh bells dangling from each rib add to the merriment.

Tie up plenty of small favors in tissue paper packages and fasten them to the ribs by strings of different length. There should be at least one package for each young guest. Several for each child will be yet more fun.

Form the children in a large circle, with one of their number in the center holding the umbrella.

Some one at the piano should play a gay march or twostep, and the children should move in a grand chain first in one direction, then in the other. When the music suddenly stops the dancers stop with it, and the child in the center raises the umbrella high above his head three times.

The present that aways longest is his. Great is the excitement of the circle watching the dangling gifts and speculating on what their friend will draw.

Before the umbrella holder unties his gift he calls out to boy or girl, as the case may be:

"Jane, come next within the ring!
The magical umbrella swing
And see what gift a shower will bring
To you while we do dance and sing."

FOR THE TEA TABLE.

Hostess Looking For Novelty Serves Rissolettes With Tea.

The hostess who wants novelties for her afternoon tea or card party can find them in rissoles and rissolettes, that can be made at home quite as delicously as by the caterer.

A rissole is nothing but a croquette wrapped in pastry and fried in boiling lard. Special irons come for frying these dainties, but they are not necessary.

Roll out thin squares of puff paste, and on top place the croquette mixture of chicken, stirred into a well seasoned white sauce and molded when cold into regular croquette shapes. Fold the pastry around the meat, seal the edges with white of egg, dip into egg and well seasoned breadcrumbs and fry in boiling lard.

Rissolettes are sheets of pastry rolled very thin and dotted with currant jelly, orange marmalade or any desired preserve. A large sheet of pastry is rolled thin, covered with dots of the preserve and topped by another sheet of pastry.

To prevent the jam from spreading the pastry about the jelly is wet with ice water for about half an inch in. Cut in circles, diamonds or any desired shape, pinch the edges together, brush with white of egg and cinnamon.

These rissolettes can either be fried in hot lard or, what is easier, baked in a hot oven for about fifteen minutes.

A Novelty at Cards.

Those who give card parties are always anxious to get new and clever methods of keeping individual scores. Everything that can be thought of has been done in the way of ingenious cards.

At a recent card party a novelty was introduced by giving each guest a wire bracelet. Every time a game was won a colored bead was strung on it. These made rather pretty souvenirs to take home.

As gold wire was used and vivid stones of large size were chosen, the bangles of the winners were quite gay ornaments before the evening was over.

Another hostess elaborated this idea by using tiny ten cent toys instead of beads. These were hooked on the bracelet with bits of gold wire. This idea was enthusiastically received, and it might make a good suggestion for hostesses of coming card parties.

In great attempts it is glorious even to fail.—Longinus.

The evidence of the first day's trial of the case of the people against Hugh Stires was the all engrossing topic that night in Smoky Mountain. Barney McGlun perhaps aptly expressed the consensus of opinion when he said, "I allow we all know he's guilty, but nobody believes it."

Late as Smoky Mountain sat up that night, however, it was on hand next morning, rank and file, when the court convened.

All the previous evening, save for a short visit to the cell of his client, Felder had remained shut in his office, thinking of the morrow. In his talk with Harry he had not concealed his deep anxiety, but to his questions there was no new answer, and he had returned from the interview more nonplused than ever. He had wondered that Jessica on this last night did not come to his office, but had been rather relieved than otherwise that she did not. He had gone to bed heavy with discouragement and had waked in the morning with foreboding.

As he turned from greeting his client in the packed courtroom Felder noted with surprise that Jessica was not in her place; not that he needed her further testimony, for he had drawn from her the day before all he intended to utilize, but her absence disturbed him, and instinctively he turned and looked across the sea of faces toward the door.

Harry's glance followed his, and a deeper pain beleaguered it as his eyes returned to the empty chair. He saw Mrs. Halloran whisper eagerly with the lawyer, who turned away, with a puzzled look. In his bitterness the thought came to him that the testimony had sapped her conviction of his innocence; that his refusal to answer her entreaties had been the last straw to the load under which it had gone down; that she believed him indeed the murderer of Moreau. To seem the cringing criminal, the pitiful liar and actor in her eyes! The thought stung him. Her faith had meant so much.

The ominous feeling weighed heavily on Felder when he rose to continue the testimony for the prisoner, so rudely disturbed the evening before. In such a community pettifogging was of no avail. Throwing expert dust in jurors' eyes would be worse than useless. In his opening words he made no attempt to conceal the weakness of the defense, evidentially considered. Stripped of all husk, his was to be an appeal to Caesar.

Through a cloud of witnesses concisely, consistently, yet with a winning tactfulness that disarmed the objections of the prosecution, he began to lead them through the series of events that had followed the arrival of the self forgotten man. Out of the mouths of their own neighbors—Devlin, Barney McGlun, Mrs. Halloran, who came down weeping they were made to see as in a cyclorama the struggle for rehabilitation against hatred and suspicion, the courage that had dared for a child's life, the honesty of purpose that showed in self surrender. The prisoner, he said, had recovered his memory before the accusation and asserted his absolute innocence. Those who believed him guilty of the murder of Dr. Moreau must believe him also a vulgar liar and poseur. He left the inference clear: If the prisoner had fired that cowardly shot he knew it now; if he lied now he had lied all along, and the later life he had lived at Smoky Mountain, eloquent of fair dealing, straightforwardness of purpose, kindliness and courage, had been but hypocrisy, the lootless artifice of a shallow buffoon.

The session was prolonged past the noon hour, and when Felder rested his case it seemed that all that was possible had been said. He had done his utmost. He had drawn from the people of Smoky Mountain a dramatic story and had filled in its outlines with color, force and feeling. And yet as he closed the lawyer felt a sick sense of failure.

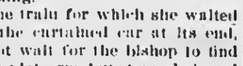
Court adjourned for an hour, and in the interim Felder remained in a little room in the building, whither Dr. Brent was to send him sandwiches and coffee from the hotel.

"You made a fine effort, Tom," the latter said as they stood for a moment in the emptying courtroom. "You're doing wonders with no case, and the town ought to send you to congress on the strength of it. I declare, some of your evidence made me feel as mean as a dog about the rascal, though I knew all the time he was as guilty as the devil."

The lawyer shook his head. "I don't blame you, Brent," he said, "for you don't know him as I do. I have seen much of him lately, been often with him, watched him under stress, for he doesn't dissolve himself—he has no thought of acquittal! We none of us knew Hugh Stires. We put him down for a shallow, vulgar blackleg, without redeeming qualities. But the man we are trying is a gentleman, a refined and cultivated man of taste and feeling. I have learned his true character during these days."

"Well," said the other, "if you believe in him, so much the better. You'll make the better speech for it. Tell me one thing. Where was Miss Holmes?"

"I don't know."



Chapter 30

TO stand face to face with Harry Sanderson—that had been Jessica's sole thought. The news that the bishop, with the man she suspected, was speeding toward her—to pass the very town wherein Hugh stood for his life—secured a prearrangement of eternal justice. When the telegram reached her she had already gone by Twin Peaks. To proceed would be to pass the coming train. At a farther station, however, she was able to take a night train back, arriving again at Twin Peaks in the gray dawn of the next morning.

When the train for which she waited came in, the curtained car at its end, she did not wait for the bishop to find her on the platform, but stepped aboard and made her way slowly back. It startled again as she threaded the last Pullman, to find the bishop on its rear platform peering out anxiously at the receding station.

He took both her hands and drew her into the empty drawing room. He was startled at her pallor. "I know," he said pityingly. "I have heard."

She winced. "Does Anlston know?"

"Yes," he answered. "Yesterday's newspapers told it."

She put her hand on his arm. "Can you guess why I was coming home?" she asked. "It was to tell Harry Sanderson! I know of the fire," she went on quickly, "and of his injury. I can guess you want to spare him strain or excitement, but I must tell him!"

He reflected a moment. He thought he guessed what was in her mind. If there was any one who had ever had an influence over Hugh for good it was Harry Sanderson. He himself, he thought, had none. Perhaps, remembering their old comradeship, she was longing now to have this influence exerted to bring Hugh to a better mind, thinking of his eternal welfare, of his making his peace with his Maker.

"Very well," he said. "Come," and led the way into the car.

Jessica followed, her hands clinched tightly. She saw the couch, the profile on its cushions turned toward the window where forest and stream slipped past—a face curiously like Hugh's! Yet it was different, lacking the other's strength, even its refinement. And this man had molded Hugh! These vague thoughts lost themselves instantly in the momentous surmise that filled her imagination. The bishop put out his hand and touched the relaxed arm.

The trepidation that darted into the bandaged face as it turned upon the girlish figure, the frosty fear that blanched the haggard countenance, spoke Hugh's surprise and dread. It was she, and she knew the real Harry Sanderson was in Smoky Mountain. Had she heard of the chapel fire, guessed the imposture and come to denounce him, the guilty husband she had such reason to hate? The twitching limbs stiffened. "Jessica!" he said in a hoarse whisper.

"Harry," said the bishop, "Jessica is in great trouble. She has come with sad news. Hugh, her husband, your old college mate, is in a terrible position. He is accused of murder. I kept the newspapers from you today because they told of it."

She had caught the meaning of the pity in his tone—for her, not for Hugh. "Ah," she cried passionately, lifting her head, "but they did not tell it all! Did they tell you that he is unjustly, wickedly accused by an enemy? That, though they may convict him, he is innocent—innocent?"

The bishop looked at her in surprise. In spite of all the past—the shameful conscienceless past and her own wrong—she loved and believed in her husband!

Hugh's hand lifted, wavered an instant before his brow. Did she say he was innocent? "I don't—understand," he said hoarsely.

Jessica's wide eyes fastened on his as though to search his secret soul. "I will tell it all," she said, "then you will understand." The bishop drew a chair close, but her gaze did not waver from the face on the cushions—the face which she must read!

As she told the broken tale the car was still, save for the labored, irregular breathing of the prostrate man and the muffled roar that penetrated the walls—a mountain-like din.

"You see," she ended, "that is why I know he is innocent. You cannot"—her eyes held Hugh's—"you cannot doubt it, can you?"

"I don't understand."

Hugh's tongue wet his parched lips. A tremor ran through him. He did not answer.

Jessica started to her feet. Self possession was failing from her. She was fighting to seize the vital knowledge that evaded her. She held out her hand. In the palm lay a small emblem of gold.

"By this cross," she cried with desperate earnestness, "I ask you for the truth. It is his life or death—Hugh's life or death! He did not kill Dr. Moreau. Who did?"

Hugh had shrunk back on the couch, his face ghastly. "I know nothing—nothing!" he stammered. "Do not ask me!"

The bishop had risen in alarm. He thought her hysterical. "Jessica! Jessica!" he exclaimed. He threw his arm about her and led her from the couch. "You don't know what you are saying. You are beside yourself." He forced her into the drawing room and made her sit down. She was tense and quivering. The cross fell from her hand, and he stooped and picked it up.

"Try to calm yourself," he said, "to think of other things for a few moments. This little cross—I wonder how you come to have it? I gave it to Sanderson last May to commemorate his ordination." He twisted it open. "See, here is the date, May 28. That was the day I gave it to him."

She gave a quick gasp, and the last vestige of color faded from her cheek. She looked at him in a stricken way. "Last May?" she said faintly. Harry Sanderson had been in Anlston, then, on the day Dr. Moreau had been murdered. Her house of cards fell. She had been mistaken! She leaned her head back against the cushion and closed her eyes.

Presently she felt a cold glass touch her lips. "Here is some water," the bishop's voice said. "You are better, are you not? Poor child! You have been through a terrible strain. I would give the world to help you if I could."

He left her, and she sat dully trying to think. The regular jar of the trucks had set itself to a rhythm—no hope, no hope, no hope! She knew now that there was none. When the bishop reentered she did not turn her head. He sat beside her awhile, and she was aware again of his voice, speaking soothingly. At moments thereafter he was there, at others she knew that she was alone, but was unconscious of the flight of time. She knew only that the day was fading. On the chilly whirling landscape she saw only a crowded room, a jury box, a judge's bench and Hugh before it, listening to the sentence that would take him from her forever. The bright sunlight was mercilessly, satanically cruel and God a sneering monster turning a crank.

Into her conscious view grew distant snowy ranges, hills unrolling at their feet, a straggling town, a staring white courthouse and a grim low building beside it. She rose stumblingly, the train quivering to the brakes, as the bishop entered.

"This is Smoky Mountain," she said with numb lips. "That is the building where he is being tried. I am going there now."

The bishop opened the door and gave her his hand to the platform. The train was to stop but ten minutes. He stood a moment watching her as she crossed to the street; then, with the sadness deep in his heart, entered the station to send a telegram.

* * * * * * *

Hugh's haggard face peered after them through a rift in a window curtain. What could she have suspected? Not the truth! And only that could betray him. Presently the bishop would return, the train would start again, and this spot of terror would be behind him. What had he to do with Harry Sanderson?

He bethought himself suddenly of the door. If some one should come in upon him! With a qualm of fear he stood up, staggered to it and turned the key in the lock. There was not the wonted buzz about the station. The place was silent save for the throb of the halted engine, and the shadow of the train on the frosty platform quivered like a criminal. A block away he saw the courthouse. Knots of people were standing about its door waiting for what? A fit of trembling seized him.

All his years Hugh had been a moral coward. Life to him had been sweet for the grosser, material pleasures it held. He had cared for nobody, had held nothing sacred. He had now only to keep silence, let Harry Sanderson pay the penalty, and he need dread no more. Hugh Stires, to the persuasion of the law, would be dead. As soon as might be he could disappear, as the rector of St. James' had disappeared before. He might change his name and live at ease in some quarter of the world, his alarm laid forever.

But a worse thing would haunt him to scare his sleep—he would be doubly blood guilty!

In the awful moment while he clung to the iron bars of the collapsing rose window, with the flames clutching at him, Hugh had looked into hell and shivered before the judgment. "The wages of sin is death." In that fiery ordeal the cheapness and swagger, the ostentation and self esteem, had burned away, and his soul had stood naked as a whiter wood. Dying bed did then been the austere terror. What came after? That had startled him. Yet Harry Sanderson was not afraid!

NEXT Monday the voters of Charlevoix will be called upon to select the men who will direct the affairs of the city the coming year. Partisanship should not enter in this contest except to vote your party ticket when you consider the candidates named thereon are the superior or equal to their opponents.

For Mayor, Captain Wilbur has had a long experience, both as a member of the council and acting mayor, during which time he has looked after the financial affairs of the city.

Mayor Rose has served one term as mayor and has seen service on the council. The other candidates on the city ticket are well known and competent men.

For alderman, Mr. Paddock and Mr. McNeill in the first are both popular men, the question is, which would you rather employ to manage your business, for the business of the city is yours.

In the second, W. J. Rachow, since living in our city, has demonstrated that he possesses business ability of a high order and we believe the city would be very fortunate if it can secure his services on its board of directors. Mr. Smith, the labor candidate is running for re-election.

Mr. Ward and Mr. Webster, the third ward candidates, go before the people with splendid records. Mr. Ward has never hesitated during his service to give the city his best efforts and would do the same in the future. Mr. Webster, during his previous term, was a hustling progressive member and no doubt would be a valuable man.

The second ward is the only one where their is a contest for supervisor. Mr. Iddings is a man of affairs, who has served on the board before. Mr. Zeitler also has had several years experience.

Take the tickets as they stand and they are good ones, but we can see no reason why any Republican should split his ticket.

The Question of Local Option

This space will be devoted to the discussion of the question of local option. Only matter which is furnished us by regular representatives of each faction will be used as we see fit. The COURIER is not responsible for anything appearing under this head, nor does it in any way represent the policy of this paper.

FOR THE DRYS

EDITOR CHARLEVOIX COURIER:

I have been reader of your paper for many years. I have never asked you before to give me space in your columns but, I cannot stand the sluring talk which the saloon keepers are imposing upon the farmer also some business men of Charlevoix who claim the farmers will not go to trade where there is no saloon, this is a false statement. The farmer who is wise like all other business men goes to the best market, where he can get best price for his produce, or what ever he may have to sell. The fellow, or farmer, who goes to town because there is booze there should not be classed as a farmer, he should be classed, with the boozer. If the business men of Charlevoix want the farmers to come to Charlevoix drive out your liquor traffic so your people will have money to buy our produce and I can assure you your business will be increased. Now listen! I know of a number of farms in our town which have been taken mortgages simply because the occupants spent their money and the earnings of the family for booze.

They claim our taxes will be higher, this is another statement which I can prove is not true, we have had a little taste of the saloon business at Bay Shore. Our town received about $250, and it cost the county about $1,000. Two of our boys are now serving their time for killing one of our natives. Talk about our taxes being higher the taxpayer of Hayes is paying something like $500 or more for caring for the poor. In nine cases out of ten those poor people would be supporting themselves if it were not for the booze. What an argument.

The farmer won't go where there is no booze. It makes me tired when I think of such a statement. I saw last fall, when hauling sugar beets to Charlevoix, two young married men as soon as they got in town go direct to the saloon. I suppose if Charlevoix had no saloon those fellows would have drawn their beets over to Petoskey or some other town. Just listen our merchants won't have as good a trade. I know of a fellow who drew some money to buy feed for his horses and groceries for his family, but he went to the saloon first. He got pretty well filled with this good old friend booze and came home without feed or groceries. Who was the gainer, the merchant or the saloon keeper. This is only one case in ten thousand. I would like to ask the saloon keeper how he would like to live in some of the hovels which his patrons live in, and eat from his table.

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise."

Well, they say, the farmer won't patronize a town where there is no saloon. I am a farmer myself and this kind of a statement does not make me feel very friendly toward the man who sells the poisonous drugs. It is the worst enemy the farmer has to contend with. The hired man, on the farm, goes to town and gets on his sprees, as they are sometimes called, when he is most need. He leads the farmer's boys to drink, he spends his hard earnings, which he would put in the bank or use for some good purpose. Here is a sample of what I know to be a fact a young man said to me, not long ago. "Well I had a good time during the holidays, I spent thirty-two dollars treating the boys." This fellow has spent his life time earnings for booze. His school mate has not boozed and owns property worth at least $10,000. Has the saloon been a good thing for the one who boozed?

The liquor traffic makes a harvest field for the doctor; Why! because men spend their money for booze which ought to go to the dry goods merchant or shoe man. Their children are kept from school for want of clothes, they catch cold and are an easy prey for disease, they eat improper food. The saloon business is a slow way of murdering our people. I know of a number of people who have lost their lives while under the influence of liquor. The coroner pronounces it killed accidentley while on a railroad track. Who is to blamed? Booze, if they hadn't been drunk they would heard the train.

Now brother farmer, be honest, with your self and your fellow men, be sure the cross on your ticket is opposit Yes and let us join ourselves together and sweep the country clean of the greatest curse mankind is pested with. If you haven't got a boy or girl of your own vote yes for the sake of some one else's and your name will be written there. A FARMER

Robert W. Kane,
Charlevoix, Mich.

Dear Sir:

I am in receipt of yours of the 25th relative to the letter of H. Cohn. In reply would say that such a person as H. Cohn has been in the business of buying junk here for several years, but that he recently skipped out and his present whereabouts are not known by several here who would like to know. While among other things he used to buy some bottles, I am sure that this branch of his business was not very extensive. He devoted the most of his time buying old iron, rags, etc., on the whole he was a worthless sort of fellow, wholly unreliable, and I have no hesitation in saying that, personally under no conditions would I believe him under oath. I am no longer prosecuting attorney, although I held that position for four years and during that time conducted many prosecutions for violation of the local option law, and am frank to say that I am sure that the law has been of vast benefit to the business conditions of this county. I trust your people will be successful in your campaign.

Very truly yours,
R. W. CHASE.

Tuesday I returned from a trip through the dry counties of Gratiot, Midland, Wexford and Missaukee. I made careful inquiry of all classes of business men and over seventy per cent assured me that if the question were again submitted their counties would give a far larger majority for local option than before. H. B. Cannon of Rochester the well known farmer's institute lecturer assures me that the same is true of Oakland county. E. S. STACKS.

Evidence From Midland

The situation in Midland county is somewhat perplexing. The city of Coleman, and the townships are very strongely in favor of the dry system. The city of Midland is divided. Like Cadillac Midland city went wet but unlike Cadillac she refused gracefully to accept the verdict of the county as a whole. The fight has been kept up. The "wets" went in and captured the law and order president who also as mayor is the one who in public utterance gloats over his own statement that Midland is in an era of whiskey drinking and empty houses, which statements are denied on almost every hand. A test case from the city to the supreme court seeking to overturn local option in the county was decided in favor of the drys Monday. This factional fight is also in the board of supervisors.

Under these circumstances there is some feeling against Midland by the farmers. But in spite of all this from May 11, 1908, to February 1, 1909, Midland's two banks show a net increase of deposits of about $10,000, of this amount, however, some $15,000 in the Mayor's bank is insurance money received on account of burning of school house. With this allowance his bank is about $5,000 behind what it was in May showing a significant fact in

MICROBES IN THE SCALP

The Latest Explanation Is That Microbes Cause Baldness.

Profesor Unna of Hamburg, Germany and Dr. Sabourand of Paris, France, share the honor of having discovered the hair microbe.

Baldness is not caused through a few weeks' work of these hair microbes, but is the result of conditions brought about by their presence. Baldness may not occur until years after the microbes began work, but it is certain to come sooner or later.

The microbes cut off the blood supply. They feed on the fatty matter about the root of the hair through which the blood is absorbed. Finally the fatty matter is wholly consumed, the food supply of the hair is gone and it starves and finally dies.

Resorcin is one of the most effective germ destroyers; Beta Napthol is both germicidal and antiseptic; Pilocorpin, though not a dye, restores natural color to hair when when loss of color was caused by disease. These curatives properly mixed with alcohol as a stimulent, perfect a remedy unequalled for curing scalp and hair troubles.

We want everyone who has any scalp or hair trouble to try Rexall "93" Hair Tonic, which contains all these ingredients. If it does not grow hair on your bald head, stop your hair from falling out; cure you of dandruff; make your hair thick, silky, luxuriant; if it does not give you complete satisfaction in every particular, return the empty bottle to us, and we shall return every penny you paid us for it, without question or formality.

Of course, you undertand that when we say that Rexall "93" Hair Tonic will grow hair on bald heads, we do not refer to cases where the roots are entirely dead, the pores of the scalp closed, and the head has the shiny appearance of a billiard ball. In cases like this, there is no hope. In all other cases of baldness Rexall "93" Hair Tonic will positvely grow hair, or cost the user nothing. Two sizes 50c and $1.00. The Ivy Drug Store, A. B. MISERY IN STOMACH

And Indigestion Vanishes Five Minutes Later.

Eat Your Favorite Foods Without Fear of Dyspepsia or an Upset Stomach Resulting.

Why not start now—today, and forever rid yourself of Stomach trouble and Indigestion? A dieted stomach gets the blues and grumbles. Give it a good eat, then take Pape's Diapepsin to start the digestive juices working. There will be no dyspepsia or belching of Gas or eructations of undigested food; no feeling like a lump of lead in the stomach or heartburn, sick headache and Dizziness, and your food will not ferment and poison your breath with nauseous odors.

Pape's Diapepsin cost only 50 cents for a large case at any drug store here, and will relieve the most obstinate case of Indigestion and Upset Stomach in five minutes.

There is nothing else better to take Gas from Stomach and cleanse the stomach and intestines, and besides, one triangule will digest and prepare for assimilation into the blood all your food the same as a sound, healthy stomach will do it.

When Diapepsin works your stomach rests—gets itself in order, cleans up—and then you feel like eating when you come to the table, and what you eat will do you good.

Absolute relief from all Stomach Misery is waiting for you as soon as you decide to begin taking Diapepsin. Tell your druggist that you want to be thoroughly cured of Indigestion.

DON'T BREAK DOWN.

Occasional Flights From the Grind Better Than Skilled Specialists.

There would not be so many worn-out, fagged looking women if we learned early the value of that ounce of prevention. With most of us prevention is like thunder—it comes after the danger is past.

So much of the misery of life is preventable that it is pitiful how rarely the effort is made. We lose our looks, break down before our time and either are snuffed out altogether or hang on creaking hinges when we should be in the full flush of living.

Most women act as if they were fatalists—what must be must be. Then they groan when the inevitable occurs instead of living up to the true fatalist spirit of stoicism.

Perhaps you are one of the persons who ever take any rest. You look on life as a race to be run, forgetting that the strongest runner goes slow until the finish.

Have you the foolish idea that to stop a minute to read the papers or to dip into a famous book is stealing time that should be devoted to husband or children? Are you charitable to every one but yourself and look upon letting up in your mad pace as shirking?

Are you one of those misguided beings who think monotonous plodding is duty and crush out young longings for an occasional matinee or social outing lest you fall in some chimerical duty?

If so, readjust things. Learn to look on these things as "that ounce of prevention" without which smashups are inevitable. It is continual plodding that not only makes life stale, but brings wrinkles and narrow minds.

Do you ever stop to think what a breakdown means? How many of the coveted pleasures or longed for rests could have been had for the doctor's hire?

Occasional flight from the grind is better than skilled specialists to keep one well, which is the sensible modern woman's reading of "that ounce of prevention."

THE NEW COIFFURE.

Smart Women Have Taken Up the Parted Pompadour.

After all the preaching about the parted pompadour, it didn't come in until the season was well started. Now the smart women are rapidly taking it up. At the opera, at dinner dances, at the theater and wherever women gather with bare heads the parted pompadour is the mode of the moment.

It is doubtful if the small roll of hair over the temples could be dignified by the name of pompadour. It stands out little from the face. It is slightly waved, more often at home than on the irons of the hairdresser. The parting is on the left side and the hair brushed away from it in mannish fashion.

At the right side of the part the hair sweeps down over the brow and across the temples in a large rippling wave. The left side goes back over the ear and is tucked into the small Psyche knot that stands straight out from the head.

Every one thought this parted pompadour would be unbecoming. On the contrary, it is quite attractive and a charming relief from the mass of ruffed and ratted hair that we have been wearing over the brow for years.

Whatever rats or crapes are put into the hair to keep it out now are used at the sides. They must not go across the back except under the Psyche knot.

The correct coiffure adopted by the majority has the hair brushed up smoothly from the nape of the neck to the knot itself. There is no bulging out or sagging down. It is a clean Grecian sweep, usually held in place by a wide barrette.

SEWING SUGGESTIONS.

Pretty shades for the center table lamps may be made easily at home. Take the wire frames and cover them with shimmery silk or tissue paper. If the paper is used make cords of the same. Insets of filet net in the silk shades are specially effective and not difficult to place.

An embroiderer gives this rule for working initials on lingerie: Never use anything on cotton for embroidery but cotton. If the material is linen take care to use linen thread. Best results are obtained if when padding is necessary the same thread is used for this part of the work as for the embroidery proper.

For a coat hanger get three heavy wires about twenty-six inches long and cover them with ribbon casings, using black, yellow and red for the different cases. Fasten the three wires together, braid them and finish each end with ribbon bows. Cover a wire for the hanger. These can be made of any ribbon covering.

To correctly find one's waist measure so as to be able to put belt or girdle on shirt waist cut shirt waist somewhat shorter than full length pattern; make waist and then try on; tie a tape around waist, placing fullness in back, front and sides just as desired. Then take a lead pencil, mark the waist all around just below tape. Cut off even with marked line after taking off waist. Put on belt, remembering to have measured distance from middle of back to underarm seam so as to know exactly where to let fullness be. This is an excellent idea and will be of great benefit to home dressmakers.

DOING THE CZAR.

A Display of Quick Wit by the Comedian Martinoff.

The Emperor Nicholas of Russia was once "sold" as follows:

During an interview which Martinoff, the comedian and mimic, had succeeded in obtaining with Prince Volkhonsky, high steward, the emperor walked into the room unexpectedly, yet with a design, as was soon made evident.

Telling the actor that he had heard of his talents and should like to see a specimen of them, he bade him mimic the old minister. The feat was performed with so much gusto that the emperor laughed immoderately and then, to the great horror of the poor actor, desired to have himself "taken off."

"'Tis physically impossible," pleaded Martinoff.

"Nonsense!" said Nicholas. "I insist on its being done."

Finding himself on the horns of a dilemma, the mimic took heart of grace and, with a promptitude and presence of mind that probably saved him, buttoned his coat over his breast, expanded his chest, threw up his head and, assuming the imperial part to the best of his power, strode across the room and back; then, standing opposite the minister, he cried in the exact tone and manner of the czar:

"Volkhonsky, pay M. Martinoff 1,000 silver rubles!"

The emperor for a moment was disconcerted; but, recovering himself with a smile, he ordered the money to be paid.

Sitting Down Gracefully.

Note the studied attention which a woman of the world desirous of possessing real grace must pay to her every action. For instance, the manner in which women sit down on their present day gowns deserves to be an object of special study on the part of all persons of taste, and the choice of a particular kind of chair is not without importance. A low ottoman seat is advantageous for the suppleness of a youthful, slightly developed figure. A deep seated chair becomes better a more heavily built person, who should make a point of sitting upright in order to bring out the beautiful lines of the neck and chest. In a luxurious armchair a very thin woman may increase her fragility, and her slender hands on the arms of the chair will be shown off to great advantage.

"You say that you do not object to me on account of my age, Miss Gwenyra?"

"No, I don't mind your age a bit, Mr. Rypun."

"Then what is the objection, may I ask?"

"You look it."—Chicago Tribune.

Natural Gas And Miranda.

By MARY ALDINE

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

Mr. Samuel Perkins, assisted by two Italians, all with their coats and vests off and perspiring profusely, was boring an artesian well on his farm.

Suddenly the drill was forced out of the ground. There followed a great puff of vapor that had the odor of bad eggs and sulphur mixed together. Mr. Perkins had struck a natural gas well.

A month later Mrs. Perkins was saying to him:

"Samuel, remember that we spell our name P-a-r-k-i-n-s; also that a month hence we sail for Europe. We've got money, and we're got a daughter Miranda. We are going to give her a chance."

"A chance for what?" asked the husband, who was trying to get used to wearing a collar and a coat around the house.

"To get polished up and to marry some one worthy of her. You needn't sit there thinking that a few weeks ago Miranda was hanging out the clothes. We've struck natural gas, and that makes a difference. We sail in four weeks."

"I did kinder think we might go to Niagara Falls for a week or so"—began Samuel as he rubbed his chin.

"What's Niagara Falls to people with money? What are they to Miranda? Samuel Parkins, can't you realize that you struck gas?"

"I know I did."

"We are climbing for the top of the ladder. We can't be kept down. Haven't you got it through your head yet? It's Europe and polish. It's Europe and a husband for Miranda. If them Chicago butchers can take their daughters to Europe and marry them off to lords and dukes, why can't we?

"Isn't natural gas just as high toned as pork chops? You keep a coat on and your shoes black and get used to looking like somebody and leave the rest to me."

Mr. Parkins would rather have sat on the steps of the village and related for the five hundredth time what his emotions were when he struck gas, but he was dragged off to Europe.

Miranda betrayed a surprising lack of interest, but Mrs. Parkins did the thing with all her might. She had native wit and observation. By sitting in a corner most of the time and having as little as possible to say the husband and father made out after a fashion.

In due time he even became interested in things. He became so interested that one evening after they had been in London for a fortnight he asked his wife:

"Mary, are we hitting the pike all right?"

"Hitting the pike?" she repeated in scornful tones. "Samuel, cut the pike and other things out. Miranda and me are watching ourselves every minute, and you want to do the same. Don't you leave the spoon in the cup when you drink your coffee, and don't tuck your table napkin clear up under your ears. If you spoil Miranda's chances I'll never forgive you."

"But what I want to know is has any feller come around yet?" persisted the husband.

"No, not exactly. But I've noticed different ones looking at her and sorter edging around. You leave that part of it to us, and you tend to yours. Whenever you can, you just drop in a word about natural gas and millions."

"Oh, I won't spoil nobody's chances. I didn't want to come at first, but now that I've got over here I rayther like it. Makes a feller feel as if he was somebody to have a boy ready at every turn to brush off his coat.

"I guess I'd be proud to have a lord or a duke for a son-in-law. That's Miranda's lowest figger, hain't it? She hain't coming over here and then take up with no hayseed?"

It was Paris after four weeks in London, and there was a continual improvement in the family. Miranda and her mother picked up as much as one French word a day, and the husband and father left his fears behind him and assumed a little swagger and a patronizing air that sat well on him.

He had struck natural gas at home simply by accident. He reasoned that he might strike a husband for Miranda abroad in the same way. Therefore whenever he came across any one who would listen to him and who could speak English he introduced gas wells into the conversation.

It was always in the plural. It was never one gas well, but half a dozen. He also tried his best to make the head waiter understand the gas question, and if he did not succeed entirely he at least elicited the exclamation:

"Gas from the ground, mon dieu! And each well $1,000,000! How you must suffer with so much money!"

"Yes, a heap of suffering, but I grit my teeth and stand it."

When Mrs. Parkins announced that they were to leave Paris for a resort in the Alps, Mr. Parkins had his opportunity to ask:

"Any feller in sight yet?"

"Samuel, hain't you got no polish in these last two months?" demanded the wife.

"Of course I have."

"Then show some of it. No gentleman would speak in that brutal manner. I'm glad Miranda was not here."

"Well, has any lord or duke been making up to her?"

"Making up! Making up! Humph! Mr. Parkins, are you in Europe or Texas? My daughter Miranda cannot be made up to. I catch your meaning, however, and in order that you may not use any more such expressions let me say that I'm not worrying."

"You mean"—

"I mean that we are going to Switzerland to stop for a month or more at the same hotel with a lord."

"By George, but you don't mean it!" exclaimed the husband. "How in thunder did you bring it about?"

"Samuel!"

"Yes, but that's a cute trick of yours. You'll have him penned right up."

"Samuel Parkins!" cried the wife as she flashed up.

"Oh, well, I won't say nothing more. You'n Miranda go right ahead, and I'll back you with natural gas enough to run all France. I guess it hain't for me to mix in."

Just how Mrs. Parkins located the lord doesn't matter. For a five franc piece Parisian chambermaids have been known to locate a whole duke. He wasn't registered as a lord, but that wasn't expected. He would be incog. Mr. Parkins took it that any of the forty men around the hotel might be his lordship, but the wife, with the keener intuition of her sex, spotted the right man within twenty-four hours.

Then Mr. Parkins came to the front like a ram. He introduced himself to the victim and talked of American and gas wells and dollars. There was enthusiasm in his voice as he talked of the gas that would continue to pour out of the earth for centuries to come, and he worked up considerable pathos over the admission that he hadn't enough wells to supply over half the United States. Mr. Parkins had done his full share. The rest devolved upon other shoulders.

A day or two later his lordship strolled up a mountain path by himself. A little later Mrs. Parkins and Miranda strolled up the same path. His lordship was overtaken just in time to rescue Miranda from walking out on an overhanging rock that would have surely given way with her weight and dropped her into the valley a mile below.

The half fainting girl and the shattered mother were assisted down the path to the hotel, and Mr. Parkins found them in bed to recover from the shock. He heard the story and then rushed downstairs. When he appeared half an hour later there was a bland smile on his face, and he was rubbing his hands.

"Mr. Parkins, what have you done?" asked the wife as she sat up in bed. "Have you been saying anything to his lordship?"

"Now, don't you folks get into a sweat about me," replied Mr. Parkins. "Mebbe I haven't polished up quite as fast as you have over here, but I know when to do the right thing for all that."

"And you've seen the lord?"

"I have."

"And talked with him?"

"For sure. Yes, sir—had quite a talk with him."

"Samuel Parkins, what did you say?" asked the wife as she sat up straighter and a look of fear came into her eyes.

"What should I say under the circumstances? I thanked him from the bottom of my heart for saving Miranda's life. You don't think I spoke about the weather, do you?"

"And what else, Samuel?"

"What else, pet?"

"I offered him $25 in cold cash."

Two shrieks shrieked out in chorus, and two females went into mild hysterics, only Miranda's was suspiciously like laughter, while her mother's was the real thing. It was a long minute that Mr. Parkins stood there, hands in pockets and wondering what had happened. Then his wife forced back her emotions and faintly asked:

"And—and—what?"

"And he took it and said, 'Thank ye!'"

Two days later as they sat in the train bound for home Mr. Parkins noticed a tear stealing down Mrs. Parkins' cheek. He turned to her and asked:

"Ain't you feeling chipper today?"

"Chipper! Chipper! How could I feel chipper?" exclaimed Mrs. Parkins in fierce tones.

"Dunno, but you mustn't blame me. I didn't know that he was a lord that went about saving human lives for cash on the nail! And, anyway, Miranda kin marry Joshua Rawlins to home. He writes to me that he's going to give up farming because he's struck gas too."

The Facetious Suburbanite.

The second story man had climbed into the front window of the facetious suburbanite's villa and was engaged in rifling the latter's pockets of such random possessions as were to be found therein.

"Ah, good evening, my friend," said the facetious suburbanite from the depths of his bedclothes. "Aren't you working overtime?"

"We can't help it in our business, governor," replied the burglar. "We ain't got no reg'larly organized hours of work. It's to do while you can with us, day and night."

"That's a shame!" said the facetious suburbanite. "You ought to get together and form a burglars' union for your own protection."

"We ain't a trade," retorted the burglar scornfully. "We're an industry."

"Then you should be incorporated into the steal trust," said the facetious suburbanite.

Whereupon the midnight marauder laughed so long and loud that he was overheard by the policeman on the corner, who, recognizing the laugh, immediately fled to a place of safety.—Judge.

of the hereafter. He chose death calmly, knowing that he, Hugh, was unfit to die.

Suppose he told the truth now and saved Harry. He had never done a brave deed for the sake of truth or righteousness or for the love of any human being, but he could do one now. For the one red counter that had been a symbol of a day of evil living he could render a deed that would make requital for those unpaid days. He would not have played the coward's part. It would repair the wrong he had done Jessica. He would have made expiation. Forgiveness and pity, not reproaches and shame, would follow him, and it would balance perhaps the one dreadful count that stood against him. He thought of the scaffold and shivered, yet there was a more terrible thought: It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God!

He made his way again to the door and unlocked it. It was only to cross that space, to speak, and then the grim brick building and the penalty.

With a hoarse cry he slammed the door and frantically locked it. The edge of the searching pain was upon him again. He stumbled back to the couch and fell across it face down, dragging the cushions in frantic haste over his head to shut out the sick throbbing of the steam that seemed shuddering at the fate his cowering soul dared not face.

* * * * * * *

The groups outside the courthouse made way deferentially for Jessica, but she was unconscious of it. Some one asked a question on the steps, and she heard the answer, "The state has just finished, and the judge is charging."

The narrow hall was filled, and, though all who saw gave her instant place, the space beyond the inner door was crowded beyond the possibility of passage. She could see the judge's bench, with its sedate, gray bearded figure, the jury box at the left, the moving, restless faces about it, set like a living mosaic.

She became aware suddenly that the figure at the high bench was speaking, had been speaking all along:

"With the prisoner's later career in Smoky Mountain they had nothing to do nor had the law. The question it asked—the only question it asked—was, 'Did he kill Morgan?' They might be loath to believe the same man capable of such contradictory acts—the courageous saving of a child from death, for example, and the shooting down of a fellow mortal in cold blood—but it had been truly said that such contrasts were not impossible—may, were even matters of common observation. Prejudice and bias aside, and sympathy and liking aside, they constituted a tribunal of justice. This the state had a right to demand, and this they, the jury, had made solemn oath to give."

The words had no meaning for her ears. "What did he say?" she whispered to herself piteously. She caught but a glimpse of the prisoner as the sheriff touched his arm and led the way quickly to the door through which he had been brought.

It opened and closed upon them, and the tension of the packed room broke all at once in a great respiration of relief and a buzz of conversation.

A voice spoke beside her. It was Dr. Brent. "Come with me," he said. "Felder asked me to watch for you. We can wait in the judge's room."

Chapter 31

MEANWHILE in the narrow cell Harry was alone with his bitterness. His judicial sense, keenly alive, from the very first had appreciated the woeful weakness, evidentially speaking, of his position. He had no illusions on this score. A little while—after such deliberation as was decent and seemly—and he would be a condemned criminal, waiting in the shadow of the hempen noose. In such localities justice was swift. There would be scant time between verdict and penuility—not enough doubtless, for the problem to solve itself. For the only solution possible was Hugh's dying in the hospital at Aniston: So long as the other lived he must play out the role.

And if Hugh did die, but died too late? What a satire on truth and justice! The same error which put the rope about his own neck would fold the real Hugh in the odor of sanctity. He would lie in the little jail yard in a felon's grave, and Hugh in the cemetery on the hill beneath a marble monument erected by St. James' parish to the Rev. Henry Sanderson. In the dock or in the cell, with the death watch sitting at its door, it was all one. He had elected the path, and if it led to the bleak edge of life, to the barren abyss of shame, he must tread it. He was powerless to help himself still. He had given over his life into the keeping of a power in which his better manhood had trusted. If it exacted the final tribute for those ribald years of Satan Sanderson the price would be paid.

A step came in the corridor. A voice spoke his name. The summons had come.

Before the opening of the door the hum of voices in the courtroom sank to stillness itself. The jury had taken their places. Their looks were sober and downcast. The judge was in his seat, his hand combing his beard. Harry faced him calmly. The door of a side room was partly open, and a girl's white face looked in, but he did not see.

"Gentlemen of the jury, have you arrived at a verdict?"

"We have."

There was a confusion in the hall—abrupt voices and the sound of feet. The crowd stirred, and the judge frowningly lifted his gavel.

"What say you, guilty or not guilty?"

The foreman did not answer. He was leaning forward, looking over the heads of the crowd. The judge stood up. People turned, and the room was suddenly a-rustle with surprised movement. The crowd at the back of the room parted, and up the center aisle toward the judge's desk staggered a figure—a man whose face, ghastly and convulsed, was partly swathed in bandages. At the door of the judge's room a girl stood transfixed and staring.

The crowd gasped. They saw the familiar profile, a replica of the prisoner's; the mark that slanted across the brow, the eyes preternaturally bright and fevered.

A pale faced, breathless man in clerical dress pushed forward through the press as the figure stopped—thrust out his hands blindly.

"Not—guilty, your honor!" he said.

A cry came from the prisoner at the bar. He leaped toward him as he fell and caught him in his arms.

The group in the judge's room was hushed in awestruck silence. The door was shut, but through the panels, from the courtroom, came the murmur of many wondering voices. By the sofa on which lay the man who had made expiation stood the bishop and Harry Sanderson. Jessica knelt beside it, and the judge and those who stood near him in the background knew that the curtain was falling upon a strange and tangled drama of life and love and death.

"Not—guilty, your honor!" he said.

After the one long, sobbing cry of realization, throughout the excitement and confusion, Jessica had been strangely calm. She read the swift certainty in Dr. Brent's face, and she felt a baleful thankfulness. The last appeal would not be to man's justice, but to God's mercy! The memories of the old blind days and the knowledge that this man—not the one to whom she had given her love at Smoky Mountain, at whom she dared not look—had been her lover, was now in very truth her husband, rolled about her in a stinging mist. But as she knelt by the sofa the hand that chafed the nerveless one was firm, and she wiped the cold lips deftly and tenderly.

Hugh's eyes were filming. That harrowing struggle of soul, that convulsive effort of the injured body, had demanded its price. The direful agony and its weakness had seized him. His stiffening fingers were slipping from the ledge of life, and he knew it.

He heard the bishop's earnest voice speaking from the void, "Love—covereth—all—sins." The words seemed to stand out sharply, with black gulfs of nothingness between. They roused his failing senses, called them back to the outpost of feeling.

"Not because I—loved," he said. "It—was because—I—was afraid!"

False as his habit of life had been, in that moment only the bare truth remained. With a last effort the dying man thrust his hand into his pocket, drew out a small, battered, red disk and laid it in the other's hand.

"Satan," he whispered as Harry bent over him and the flicker of light fell in his eyes, "do you—think it will—count—when I cash in?"

But Harry's answer Hugh did not hear. He had passed out of the sound of mortal speech forever.

* * * * * * *

There came a day when the brown ravines of Smoky Mountain laughed in genial sunshine, when the tangled thickets and the foliaged reaches, painted with the cardinal and bishop's purple of late autumn, flushed and stirred to the touch of their golden lover and the silver water gushing through the flumes sang to a quicker melody. There was no wind. Everywhere save for the breathing life of the forest was dreamy beauty and waiting peace.

In the soft stillness Harry stood on the doorstep of the hillside cabin for the last time. Below him in the gulch the light glanced and sparkled from the running flume, and beyond glimmered the long street of the town where the dead past of Satan Sanderson had been buried forever and the old remorseful pain of conscience had found its surcease. In the far distance, in tender haze softening their outline, stood the violet silhouette of the ending ranges, and far beyond them lay Aniston, where waited his newer life, his newer, better work and the hope that was the April of his dreams.

Since that tragic day in the courtroom he had seen Jessica once only—in the hour when the bishop's solemn "dust to dust" had been spoken above the man who had been her husband. One thought had comforted him—the town of Smoky Mountain had never known, need never know, the secret of her wifehood. And Aniston was far away. About the coming of Hugh injured and dying to his rescue would be thrown a glamour of knight errantry that would bespeak charity of judgment. When Jessica went back to the white house in the aspens she would meet only tenderness and sympathy. And that was well.

He shut the door of his cabin had, whistling to his dog, climbed the steep path where the wrinkled creeper flung its splash of scarlet and along the trail to the Knob, under the needled song of the redwoods. There in the dappled shade stood Jessica's rock statue, and now it looked upon two mounds. The prodigal had returned at last, father and son rested side by side, and that, too, was well.

He dropped on his knees and took her hands and kissed them.

He went slowly through the brown hollows to the winding mountain road, crossed it and entered the denser forest. He wanted to see once more the dear spot where he and Jessica had met—that deep, sweet day before the rude awakening. He walked on in a reverie; his thoughts were very far away.

He stopped suddenly. There before him was the little knoll where she had stood waiting on the threshold of his palace of enchantment that one roseate morning. And she was there today—not standing with parted lips and eager eyes under the twittering trees, but lying face down on the moss, her red bronze hair shaming the gold of the fallen leaves.

There was a gesture in the outstretched arms that caught at his heart. He stepped forward, and at the sound she looked up, startled.

He saw the creeping color that mounted to her brow, the proud yet passionate hunger of her eyes. He dropped on his knees and took her hands and kissed them.

"My dear love that is!" he whispered. "My dearer wife that is to be!"

THE END.

Stories of John Bright.

John Bright was supposed to be a total abstainer, but once when Edward Miall was very nervous at the prospect of having to make an important speech in the house Bright said:

"Well, Miall, if I were you I'd for once go and have a pint of champagne."

Mr. Miall did as he was told, and the result may be judged from the narrator's comment that "champagne on an unaccustomed interior is not always a curative or a tonic."

Bright "rarely had any difference with his wife," but occasionally they were not at one about the children. When they came to a point of absolute disagreement he used to say:

"Now, I tell thee, if thou doesn't do what I wish I'll go straight to Mr. Gladstone and ask him to make me a knight," to which the answer invariably was:

"Oh, anything rather than that."

He Was Not Superstitious.

A captain of an ocean liner tells the following story: Coming from the old country was a very nervous old lady who complained that she was sure there was a rat in her stateroom.

"Keep it there, madam," said the captain.

"But do you like rats?" asked she.

"I've got a nest in my cabin," retorted the brusque seaman, "and I never disturb them. When they leave the ship I do."

"Why you must be superstitious," urged the dame.

"No, ma'am," wound up the captain, "I'm not, but the rats are."

Qualified.

JERICHO.

The Famous City, Its Walls and the Curse of Joshua.

The walls of Jericho, remains of which have been excavated by German archaeologists, are, of course, chiefly famous in connection with their miraculous destruction by Joshua. It is recorded in the book of Joshua, chapter vi, that, by command of the Lord, Joshua's army compassed the city, going roundabout it once a day for six days, headed by seven priests bearing seven rams' horns before the ark. On the seventh day they encompassed it seven times. Then, on Joshua's command, "the people shouted, and the priests blew with the trumpets, and it came to pass when the people heard the sound of the trumpet that the people shouted with a great shout and the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city," destroying all that was in it, except Rahab the harlot, who had hidden the messengers sent by Joshua to spy out the city and her father's household. The date of this destruction is placed at B. C. 1451. In spite of Joshua's curse on any one who should rebuild the city, it was rebuilt in the reign of Ahab in B. C. 918 by Hiel, a native of Bethel, and it is recorded in I Kings xvi, 34, how the curse of Joshua was fulfilled. The second city flourished and under Herod the Great became important. It was sacked by one Simon, slave of Herod. Archelaus, the son of Herod, founded a new town on the plain, which he had planted with palms. Jericho was finally destroyed by Vespasian in A. D. 68.—Dundee Advertiser.

The Hissing.

"I frequently experience a hissing sound in my ears," remarked a patient to a doctor. "What would you advise me to do?"

"What is your occupation?" asked the medico.

"I'm an actor."

"Then I'd advise you to adopt some other vocation."

In Doubt.

Hairdresser (while giving lady a vigorous shampoo)—Will you have anything on your head when I am finished, madam? She—I am sure I don't know. I was in hopes you would leave enough hair to pin my hat to.

Very Convenient.

Caretaker (to prospective tenant)—Yes, this house is most conveniently situated. There's a music hall close and handy, and there's a pub just over the way, and a pawnbroker's round the corner.—London Tit-Bits.

LOCAL OPTION

comparison with an increase of $28,000 in the other bank. One business man, one of the largest firms, said that his business last year was the biggest in his history but, he added, if some of our business men don't know any better than to knock town I won't enter into controversy with them by signing any statement. But, he added, one of those very men told me his business greatly increased the early part of last year and fell away some when one of his clerks started into business. The following statements speak for themselves:

I was well pleased with local option and would be sorry to see our return to saloon times.

I have been in business in Coleman for eleven years and have done a larger and better business during the past year than any year since I have been in business here.

Looking at this question from the moral side, it has done a great deal for the city and community. We can call to mind many families where great changes for the better have taken place since local prohibition has been in effect. As mayor of this city it is my duty to look to the best interests of the city, and in advocating local option, I consider I am doing this.

MAYOR OF COLEMAN.

I am of the opinion that the city of Midland since the adoption of local option has been as prosperous in a business way as any other city or village of its size in the state and do not believe that the adoption of local option has very materially affected the general business and that if business has fallen off any, that it is due to other causes than the removal of the saloon. I am constrained to believe that when the business men of the city stop trying to creat and keep alive the saloon sentiment in an effort to maintain the saloon in local politics, we will be in line with one of the best and most prosperous towns of its size in the state. Constant knocking and the non-enforcement of the law, and the offending of the farmers and others who were in favor of local option who come to the city to trade is doing so much harm, in my opinion, that it largely destroys the good effects brought about by the removal of the saloons.

I am of the opinion, that if the question of local option was to be voted on again in this county, it would carry by a larger majority than before.

COUNTY NORMAL NOTES.

Isa Mitchell called on the normal class Friday morning.

The class took their first lesson in charcoal drawing last week.

Miss Merle Chase, of the class of '07, who is now teaching in Boyne City visited the normal room Monday morning.

A model farm has been constructed of drawing paper and mounted on black cambric. Each member of the class cut something free hand to be used in the construction such as horses, cows, houses, barns, fences, etc.

The class attended morning exercises in the assembly room of the high school Monday morning. A very interesting talk was given by Professor Catton of Benzonia academy.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

be wide enough for teams to pass and not break away upon the sides. Commissioner Bradford believes in building roads well on the start, and making them sufficiently wide to meet every emergency. By so doing the expense is greater but with him quality and permanency are first considered. He is right.

In counties where these roads have been built, has it resulted in raising the value of farm lands adjacent?

Most assuredly. Why shouldn't it? It acts this way, the same as taking a farm up bodily, and moving it just so much nearer a market. Miles do not always measure the distance a farm is from market or any given point—rather the time required to reach these points and the ability to market a given amount in the shortest time in any kind of weather. Would not a would be purchaser of a farm be most favorably influenced in his selection, all other things being equal, if a good road passed the premises, extending for miles in either direction?

MAKE THIS YOURSELF

Says Many Persons Here Can Be Made Happy Again.

Tells How Any One Can Prepare Simple Home-Made Mixture, Said To Overcome Rheumatism.

There is so much Rheumatism here in our neighborhood now that the following advice will be highly appreciated by those who suffer:

Get from any good pharmacy one-half ounce Fluid Extract Dandelion, one ounce Compound Kargon, three ounces of Compound Syrup Sarsaparilla. Shake these well in a bottle and take in teaspoonful doses after each meal and at bedtime; also drink plenty of good water.

It is claimed that there are few victims of this dread and torturous disease who will fail to find ready relief in this simple home-made mixture, and in most cases a permanent cure is the result.

This simple recipe is said to strengthen and cleanse the eliminative tissues of the Kidneys so that they can filter and strain from the blood and system the poisons, acids and waste matter, which cause not only Rheumatism, but numerous other diseases. Every man or woman here who feels that their kidneys are not healthy and active, or who suffers from any urinary trouble whatever, should not hesitate to make up this mixture, as it is certain to do much good, and may save you from much misery and suffering after while.

Our home druggists say they will either supply the ingredients or mix the prescription ready to take if our readers ask them.

How to Know the Trees.

There is an auctioneer whose "gift of the gab" and native wit draw many purchasers to his sales. But sometimes, says the Springfield Republican, he is the subject rather than the cause of amusement. The man's name is O. A. Kelley. Not long ago he had to sell among other things a lot of pine logs, and the day before the sale he went over them and marked the end of each log with his initials. On the day of the auction an Irishman came along and immediately noticed the logs with the letters on them.

"O. A. K.," he read loud enough for all round to hear. "Begorra, if 'tis not just like Kelley to deceive us into believing thim pine logs are oak!"

She Was Wise.

"Miss Fish," remarked the young man as he placed his hat on his head and prepared to depart for home, "I proposed for your hand two hours ago, and I await your answer with bated breath."

"Mr. Smallchange," snubbed the young lady, "I'm afraid you will have to bait your breath with something besides onions and cloves to catch this kind of fish."—Judge.

Several New Faces on Board of Supervisors

Labor Party Victorious in Boyne City Twenty Counties in State are Added to Dry Column.

At Monday's election everything seemed to be lost sight of except the contest between the wet and dry forces, an enormous vote being polled all over the county. A glorious victory was won by the dry forces, who carried every precinct except Peaine and Boyne Valley, the wets taking the first by two and the latter by eight.

Following is the majorities by wards and townships:

Charlevoix City

First Ward
Dry	67	35
Wet	32

NEW FISHING LAW

Introduced by Senator Ming of this District

Limits Net Fishing Indorsed by Game Warden Department.

No fishing with nets in any connecting waters of the Great Lakes so far as the state of Michigan has jurisdiction, if the general fish bill introduced by Senator Ming becomes a law.

The bill says that it will be unlawful to fish with nets in the connecting waters between Lake Superior and Lake Huron and between Lake Huron and Lake Erie. This means that the little fishes that inhabit the St. Marys, St. Clair and Detroit Rivers will hereafter need to fear only the gentle angler with the hook and line. Furthermore it is made unlawful to set nets in any of the big lakes within half a mile range of the mouth of any river or outlet of inland lakes.

Senators Ming's bill bears the approval of State Game and Fish Warden Charles Pierce. It contains a clause repealing all other fish laws, of which there were divers, that were enacted when local bills were possible.

The new phase of the bill so far as Michigan is concerned, is that covering persons licensed to fish in spawning season. It provides that persons, firms or corporations, fishing for white fish or trout in the spawning season, shall strip all ripe fish, both male and female save the spawn properly impregnate and deliver it to the State fish warden or his agents at the fishing station. All fishing boats are to be manned with sufficient force to take care of the spawn.

The state warden is to deliver to the United States bureau of fisheries so much of the spawn as it desires to fill the government hatcheries, and the remainder is to be planted on the spawning beds from which it was taken by the persons catching the fish under direction of the state warden.

The bill provides that all fishermen must keep an account of the number of pounds of fish they take and report to the warden at the end of each month. By comparison of these reports from year to year it is believed that it can be determined whether the supply of fish is being depleted.

The bill still further provides that in case the warden finds illegal sized fish in any consignment, the entire consignment can be confiscated. Heretofore it has been necessary for the warden to go over the shipments and pick out only the small fish.

State Warden Pierce believes that the new provision will be much to discourage the mixing of illegal fish with legal ones.

There will be a warm sugar social at Ironton grange hall Thursday evening, April 15. 10c a dish. F-tf

HAS BEGAN LABORS

Rev. F. Dewey Ehle the New Pastor of Baptist Church

Has Filled Several Successful Pastorates—Oxford Regrets Departure.

Rev. F. Dewey Ehle, the new pastor of the Baptist church, arrived in town last week and entered upon his labors Sunday.

Mr. Ehle is a man of very pleasing appearance and has had several years experience in his profession, for which he fitted himself at Kalamazoo and Olivet colleges, graduating from the first named institution with the class of '94. Later he took the Greek course at Colgate Theological Seminary, graduating in 1900. Has held successful pastorates at Bellevue, Otsego, Gaylord and Oxford. At the last pastorate received forty-five into church membership and, during the last year, raised over two thousand dollars for all purposes.

REV. F. DEWEY EHLE

His family consists of wife and one daughter, and as an evidence of the high esteem felt for Mr. Ehle, in this last place of service, we clip the following from the last issue of the Oxford Leader.

The time has come when the relationship of pastor and people of the local Baptist church is ended, and Rev. F. Dewey Ehle has taken his departure to enter upon a new field of labor at Charlevoix.

A farewell reception was given at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Peter Metz last week in honor of Rev. and Mrs. Ehle. One hundred were present, filling the house to its utmost capacity. Only the pastors and their wives of the other churches were invited, owing to the limited room. A social hour was enjoyed until refreshments were served. Following the sumptuous banquet order was called and Prof. T. C. Fuller, superintendent of the Oxford schools, presented Rev. Ehle with a handsome oak rocker as a token of esteem from his friends, while Mrs. Metz presented Mrs. Ehle with a purse of money.

Mr. Ehle accepted the gift, responding in a very pathetic manner, closing his remarks by prayer and singing, "Blest be the Tie That Binds." All joined in the hymn. His touching words brought tears to the eyes of many.

W. L. Sweet was then called on for remarks and convulsed the audience with laughter by his humorous stories. It was the same when Rev. Hough, pastor of the M. E. church, responded in his witty way. Two fine duets were rendered by Mesdames, Fuller and Fitch.

The clock pointed to the hour of midnight when the company dispersed to their several homes, feeling they had participated in one of the warmest receptions ever held in Oxford.

Rev. Ehle and estimable wife, by their labors of love among us, have endeavored themselves not only to the hearts of his people but the community at large.

We trust the Master has something better in store for so worthy and faithful a servant. While we regret exceedingly the seperation we also fully realize that our loss is Charlevoix's gain.

Concerning the call to Charlevoix their correspondent to the Detroit Christian Herald of March 18 says:

"On February 18 the church voted to extend a call to Rev. F. Dewey Ehle, of Oxford, to become our pastor. Rev. Ehle was not a candidate. The call was extended to him upon his record without even hearing him. The call was accepted March 9, the pastorate to begin the first of April and we will hope to be ably to give a better account of ourselves hereafter."

Charlevoix is a most beautiful place, with a resident population of 3000, which is about doubled during the summer months by resorters. The church has a membership of 181. Rev. Ehle and family expect to leave for their new location the first of next week.

FIRST WEEK IN JUNE

Eighty-Five Business Representatives of Milwaukee to Visit City

Arrangements Being Made For Their Entertainment.

Arrangements are now being made for the entertainment of the large delegation of Milwaukee business men which will arrive in this city during the first week of June. The special train of the Merchants and Manufacturer's association, consisting of nine coaches and bringing eighty-five representatives of Milwaukee business firms will leave Ludington on June 6 for a seven days trip through the west central portion of the state.

The annual excursion is in line with previous trips taken by the Merchants and Manufacturer's association through territory tributary to Milwaukee trade. In previous years trips have been taken through northern Wisconsin and the upper peninsula, southeast Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota and South Dakota. This year the itinerary of the Milwaukee business men includes thirty-one cities in Michigan.

A large part of the trade of the cities to be visited now turns to Milwaukee as the most advantageous jobbing and manufacturing center in the middle west, and members of the Merchants and Manufacturer's association are assured that this trade will be increased by the projected trip.

Milwaukee occupies a unique position with relation to the cities of western Michigan. Its situation commands excellent transportion facilities to points in this territory and its reputation as a jobbing and manufacturing centre is well known. Milwaukee's representative business organization is the Merchants and Manufacturer's association with a membership of 1400 leading business houses of the Cream City.

This association has for the past few months been working with the cross lake transportation companies for increased facilities and better connection between Milwaukee and cities off the direct line of shipment.

In addition to the business features of the trip the Milwaukee men bring with them several interesting features for the entertainment of their hosts. The famous Merchants and Manufacturer's association Octette is one of the most remarkable singing organizations of their city. Composed of eight male voices their repertoire embraces everything from the old familiar selections of the home to the more classical selections of well known composers. The success of the organization on previous excursions lends added interest to the feats which they promise to perform this year. In arranging for the entertainment of the Milwaukee business men no luches or dinners will be provided, all cities en route as the time of the merchants is so economically arranged as to provide for all meals while on the train three dinners being part of the regular train equipment. Advantages from this trip will be derived not only by the Milwaukee jobbers and manufactures but each city at which they stop will receive a large amount of valuable business publicity through the live newspaper men, representing Milwaukee news papers, who will accompany the merchants throughout the entire excursion. Each day of the trip column articles will appear in all the Milwaukee papers containing descriptions of the territory visited. At each city visited it is planned to hold a general celebration with addresses by the mayor, the local officials and by the visitors.

WILL OPEN TO-MORROW

Kalamazoo Tailoring & Furnishing Company in Fagan Building

The new business house, the Kalamazoo Furnishing & Tailoring Company will open their doors to the public to-morrow in the Fagan building with a complete line of furnishing goods and samples of the latest things for the spring trade in the tailoring line.

A. B. Overholt, the manager, has had several years experience in the business, having been with the large establishment of Charles Gray of Kalamazoo, while Messrs. McCleary and VanSickler the other members of the firm, are wide awake business men. All have families and have come here with the determination to make Charlevoix their future home and to build up their business by square business methods.

DELIGHTFUL SOCIAL EVENT

Party Given at Baker's Inn by Dr. and Mrs. Armstrong.

Friday night Dr. and Mrs. Armstrong were the hosts of one of the most delightful social events of the season, a party given at Baker's Inn, about one hundred guests being present. The evening was spent in dancing and playing different games of cards, music being given during the early part of the evening by the Shakespeare orchestra. The new tea room was opened for the first time in honor of the occasion, the house being beautiful decorated with palms and carnations.

All left for home pronouncing it a most fitting close of the winter's festivities.

CITY OF THE INSANE.

Happy and Honored "Guests" of the Inhabitants of Ghael.

One of the most remarkable places in Europe, of which no tourist on pleasure bent ever takes notice, says a writer in a Berlin paper, is the "City of the Insane," by which name Ghael, near Antwerp, has been known for generations. About 1,500 men and women afflicted with insanity in all its forms live there and have a happy being as the "guests" of the inhabitants, who know by experience how to treat the unfortunate ones. In the streets, in the places of amusement, the cafes and workshops these patients may be found, and nowhere is there the remotest suggestion of restraint apparent. The board ranges from 240 to 2,400 marks a year, and, no matter how small the amount may be, the patient is always the favored member of the family. He has the first right to the most comfortable chair, and the head of the table belongs to him. He receives the most attention, and this he learns to appreciate and to endeavor to maintain by living down his illness. Even the children know how to treat the demented people. The dangerous ones are sent to another settlement and to institutions. It is wonderful how considerate, careful and kind the simple people are toward their charges, and a peep into the community would probably terrify physicians who had never heard of and could not appreciate the good which is being done in this "City of the Insane."

CROWDS AT COHEN'S CHEAP STORE

All day Saturday and up to 9:30 Saturday night, Cohen's Cheap Store was the center of attraction. Eager purchasers swarmed their big store and for two hours in the evening the sales force was swamped but everybody was taken care of after a little wait on the part of the patient customers. Years of hard work and untiring effort have proven to the good Charlevoix people and vicinity that Cohen's Cheap Store is the place to trade and everybody now realizes the same. The big store is crowded with beautiful Easter goods in all departments and it will be to the purchaser's interest to go there for anything they may want as they are always sure of getting better goods for less money. Their line of men's and boys' guaranteed suits made especially for them and their line of ladies' LaVogue suits and skirts are the biggest and prettiest line ever shown and the way they are selling is proof enough that nothing can equal them in the city F-14-tf

The election in Charlevoix reversed the order of last spring, the Republican city ticket proving victorious, electing Captain Wilbur mayor by a majority of 38 and Dutton clerk by 19. John Cook had no opposition for treasurer on the Republican ticket, and W. H. Collins for justice had none on the Labor ticket. In the wards the Republicans carried the first and lost the third. In the second, the Labor party elected Zeitler supervisor, by 41 majority the Republicans carrying everything else, electing W. J. Rachow alderman by 65 majority, the largest majority received by any candidate on either ticket.

The successful candidates are all well known. Captain Wilbur, our new mayor, has long served the city as a member of the council and will make an able chief executive. Mr. Dutton is well qualified for the position of clerk. Mr. Paddock and Mr. Rachow, the new aldermen, are business men of ability and Mr. Webster made a fine record during his previous term. Our representation on the board of supervisors is unchanged.

ANNOUNCEMENT

We will open our doors to the public Thursday evening, April 15 and cordially invite you to call and inspect our line of men's furnishing goods and ready made pants. We have a complete line of samples of the newest spring goods and will guarantee a fit and perfect satisfaction in all our work. Yours for business, The Kalamazoo Furnishing & Tailoring Company. MOST WONDERFUL INVENTION

Of the Age

LIGHTING QUESTION SOLVED

For years expert light manufactures in different parts of the world have been trying to manufacture a light whose rays would be so near those of daylight that colors could be properly matched; that one could read by without hurting the eyes; a light that would be 100 per cent perfect and still be within the reach of rich and poor alike.

The Standard Gillett Light company of 208-210 Michigan St., Chicago, have at last achieved the crowning glory of the success. Not only does their light meet all the above requirements, but the cost of operating the same is less than electricity or gas. A most rigid test was recently made with the following results. One electric light, one gas light and one Standard Gillett light all at the same candle power, were burned six hours a day for thirty days. Cost of operating the electric light was $81.00, the gas light $17.25 and the Standard Gillett light $1.50. In other words, the electric light costs 54 times the gas light 12 times as much as the Standard Gillett light.

The company will send you upon request free, a large illustrated catalogue, showing further experiments.

FIGHTING THE SCALE.

How to Destroy the Fatal Enemy of Shrubs and Trees.

Nearly all our fruit trees and lots of our flowering shrubs, notably such as the flowering quince, flowering plum, etc., are infested with the San Jose scale. It means sure death to the plant if it cannot be removed entirely. March is the best of months to attack it.

You may be certain that it is there if you see any part of a woody plant covered with a minute silver grayish incrustation that looks almost like part of the bark. Scrape it with the finger nail, and it will come away and expose the real smooth brown bark underneath.

If there is only a little of it on a plant, shrub or tree it can be removed with the back of a knife. Whether you remove much or little, take care to put a sheet underneath, so that no scale will fall to the ground. It will simply climb back on the plant again or, worse still, spread to others. Shake the sheet into the fire. It is the only sure death to this fatal insect.

Even if the plant is infested in only a small portion, so far as you can see, it will not be enough to scrape it. It will need scrubbing or spraying just as if the whole plant were infested.

To cleanse a growth that is thoroughly affected spread a sheet on the ground under it. Make a thick, stinging lather with whale oil or even common kitchen soap and hot water and scrub the whole plant, beginning at the top, with the stiffest kind of a scrubbing brush or a wire brush if you can get one.

Scrub till every part of the bark shines out smooth and brown. Do not fear to let the lather run down the tree and into the earth. It will kill other grubs there as well as any scale that have begun to gather around the base.

After the scrubbing mix a kerosene emulsion by dissolving about a quarter of a pound of soap in half a gallon of boiling water. When thoroughly dissolved, stir in one gallon of kerosene and mix until the stuff looks like buttermilk. Put about a cupful of this into about five pints of cold water and apply it with a spray pump or, paint it on with a brush till the tree is completely coated.

If this process does not destroy the scale, give it one or two more treatments with the emulsion during March. If the scale covers the plant again and it gets pretty sick during the summer, rip it out to the last root and burn it. It will be better to lose the one plant than to have the whole garden infested. Be sure to burn every vestige of the sick plant. Don't throw it somewhere and trust to luck.

If the scale is really bad and has attacked most of your woody shrubs, it will be necessary to apply lime and sulphur wash, which is best bought ready mixed from dealers.

CARE OF INJURED TREES.

How to Treat Those With Torn Bark or Broken Limbs.

Nothing is more common in suburbs and cities than injuries inflicted on street trees by horses and vehicles. Very often immense sections of bark are torn from the tree, exposing the white wood beneath, and most persons feel discouraged by the extent of the wound and give the tree up.

Now, however serious a wound may be, a tree is not injured beyond hope so long as it is not completely girdled—so long as the bark has not been torn off so that there is absolutely none left in a belt around the tree.

As soon as a tree has been injured the torn bark should be forced back into place if possible. It is true that it does not often grow on again, but it does sometimes, and, at any rate, it acts as a protection for the wound, just as a piece of skin does when drawn back over the wound. After the bark has been tightly drawn into place the whole area of the injury must be thickly covered with tree wax, pitch, tar or thick paint. If there is no bark, the procedure is the same. The entire wound must be painted so thoroughly that the outer air cannot possibly get at it. If there is a hole in the tree, it should be completely plugged with melted rosin, wax, tar or anything else of that nature.

Whenever a tree is broken the ruined limbs should be cut as smoothly as a surgeon would cut a human limb, and the freshly cut place should be covered, as said before.

How to Dress to Look Smart.

If you would look smart, above all things be neat in the small appointments of your dress. Have one gown if need be, but have good gloves and good shoes and scrupulously clean linen. See to it that the heels of your boots are not run over at one side or the other, that your shoe laces are not knotted and worn, that the buttons are all in place on your high shoes, which should be carefully brushed each night or morning. If your skirt needs re-binding or pressing, have this done at once. Do not trust to it escaping notice. It is observed on occasions when you think least of it. Another point often neglected is the juncture of waist and skirt. See that your belt meets exactly in front and is either buckled or pinned securely. Have your blouse and skirt fastened firmly together in the back, neither above nor below the belt line, and be sure that your belt is wide enough to cover this line. Do not have a jagged row of pin points in evidence nor the almost inevitable safety pin.

How to Make a Refrigerator.

For a homemade refrigerator take two large wooden boxes, the second one about two inches smaller on all sides. Bore a one inch hole in both, correspondingly to give drainage and ventilation. Fill up the space under one boxes with powdered charcoal or coal ashes. Put the inner box in place and fill up all the space with the same. Fix on the lids to both boxes to fit tightly with iron hinges. Leather ones can be substituted. Fasten with straps of leather as lock and key. Put shelves on each side of the inner box, using cleats. Leave a place in center for the ice. A zinc lining or one of felt would improve the inner box. A rack made of lathing can be laid at the bottom for the ice to rest on. Legs can be added to the outer box by putting pieces of wood at each corner, and the drainage and ventilation will be improved.

How to Make Furniture Polish.

Three parts linseed oil, one part spirits turpentine and one-third part muriatic acid make an excellent furniture polish that will remove all marks. Apply this with a piece of old soft cloth, rub it thoroughly into the surface of the wood and wipe perfectly dry. You will find old cotton stocking legs excellent polishers. This polish removes every blemish, save scratches, and it covers the slight ones, making them less noticeable. A very dirty piece of furniture can first be washed and when perfectly dry the above polish will restore the natural gloss and bring out the grain of the wood.

How to Manage Baby's Strength.

Every mother knows how weak a child's neck is at first, and she always should be careful to support the neck and head by placing the hand or arm for the baby to lean his back and head against. By the time the child is three or four months old it should be able to hold the head erect if the body is supported, and by the sixth or seventh month the baby should be able to sit erect with the head held upright. By this time the child probably will begin to creep or hitch himself along the floor. At nine months the first attempt is made to stand, and many children by the time they are ten or twelve months old can stand alone.

Woman's World

A CABINET HOSTESS.

Mrs. Philander C. Knox, Wife of the New Secretary of State.

One of the most popular women of the Taft cabinet will be Mrs. Philander C. Knox, wife of the secretary of state. This gracious lady will fill her new position with the same grace and distinction she displayed as chatelaine of the attorney general's home in the Roosevelt administration.

Secretary and Mrs. Knox are the most youthful looking couple in official life. Jokes about their identity being submerged in their juvenile appearance are many. That of the old commissioner from Pittsburg when Mr. Knox was attorney general who loitered about the official office and finally sidled in when the messenger was not looking is one in which Mr. Knox delights. The man approached him stealthily and, leaning over, whispered hoarsely: "Son, I am from Pittsburg, and I want to see Knox. Here's a dollar if you slip me in right now."

There is another about the old lady who called to see Mrs. Knox and was kindly received by the hostess herself and who sat and sat and finally blurted out: "Miss Knox, you have been very good to me, but I want to see your mother. Will you just run and call her?" Mrs. Knox is petite, but as her distinguished husband is less than five feet seven she is just the right height to make the ideal couple. Her gowns are gracefully chosen and always in perfect harmony with her environs and the event. She does not attach that superlative importance to her gowns as do some Washington dames with much less income, but she is so exquisitely neat that she always looks well. Some one said that she reminds one of a little brown wren, for she is partial to brown and other subdued shades.

There are four Knox children, all well known in Washington, Pittsburg and Valley Forge.

The eldest, Mrs. James Tindle, was Rebecca Page Knox, a serious minded young woman who refused to accept the homage which comes to a cabinet minister's daughter. Reed Knox, the eldest son, startled Washington society by eloping with Miss Helen McCook, one of the clan of the fighting McCooks. Perhaps Mrs. Knox is prouder of her second son, Hugh, who is very like his father and a lawyer practicing in Pittsburg. Philander C. Knox, Jr., the third son, has been a boon companion of Kermit Roosevelt. He is known as Phil, and he is one of the young men who should be good politicians, for he is such an excellent "mixer." Phil gave a Christmas party in his early Washington career, and his guests included newsboys, messengers and bootblacks, and he insisted upon the best in the house being served for their delectation.

Mrs. Knox is the daughter of the late Andrew D. Smith of Allegheny, Pa., and as Miss Lillian Smith she was as popular in her girlhood as in her mature womanhood. Having enjoyed wealth all her life and being inured to social life, Mrs. Knox is an admirable hostess in any circle.

Chasing Away the Blues.

Every once in awhile some one learns something that he has known all the time. Paradoxical as this may seem, it is true. In a general way, you know a hundred things you only half stop to think about and really never put into practice. And then some day by mere chance you find out this old truth for yourself, and from then on it seems like a brand new discovery to you.

Perhaps, for instance, you have often heard that fresh air will do for you what drugs couldn't accomplish. A certain Cleveland girl who just the other day thought she was staring a nervous collapse in the face had always heard this, too, but it never occurred to her to take it seriously.

The nervous collapse she did take seriously, however. So would you if your head was throbbing and your muscles fairly tense with overwrought nerves. Things looked pretty black. There were hard things to bear, and—well, what's the use?—the world looked pretty dark. Possibly a doctor could help. Today there was no time, but tomorrow she would surely go. In the meantime there was an engagement which drove her out of the house. The car was not coming.

"Shall we walk?" a chance companion said.

It didn't matter—nothing mattered—so they swung off down the street, with a fresh breeze blowing against their faces.

Perhaps there was something in the way the sun shone that day, but after a few blocks things began to look just barely possible to that girl, and the "nervous collapse" did not seem quite so imminent. With another quarter mile tense muscles were relaxed, and there was only the faintest possible throb perceptible in the region of her head.

You're going to guess the end, but it happens to be a true story, and so you must hear it. By the time the errand was done the world seemed like a very livable sort of place to that girl, who had been on the verge of a breakdown.

Of course you have always heard about a brisk walk in the fresh air and its healing powers, and you always have been perfectly willing to take somebody else's word for it.

But just suppose you actually try it for yourself. Try it to cure headaches and blues and doubts and fears and all manner of hobgoblins that threaten and pursue and see for yourself what a leveling, vision brightening influence there is in just plain sunshine and air. If it doesn't work there is something on your conscience.

Woman Who Knows Her Mind.

The Spaniards are beginning to realize that Victoria is made of stronger stuff than her husband, and, despite her open leaning to English ideas, she continues to gain in popularity. It is known she attends bullfights only as a concession to public wish and national custom, and it would excite no astonishment were she to announce her absence from all bullfights in the future. Against determined opposition she has effected a revision of the rules of the Spanish court and has introduced a system which makes for the liberality of the English court, in which she was raised and from which Alfonso carried her off a bride less than three years ago. Old fashioned Spaniards profess to be shocked by the reforms the young queen has wrought, but just the same they have been unable to withhold admiration for her strength of will. It has taken brief time, in truth, to mark Victoria as the most authoritative of the women sharing as consorts the thrones of the old world.

Domestic Elimination.

It seems to be one of the troubles with any kind of elimination, whether of custom or observance, books or "truck," that what one person wants to get rid of is apt to involve something precious to some one else. No sooner do you get a shelf cleared of magazines that have been collecting neglected for a year past than some one passionately laments a priceless back number. You have only to throw out an ornament or picture that seems both failed and superfluous to hear some voice utter the horrified expostulation, "You are not going to throw that away!" But, apart from this disadvantage, elimination takes so much time and so much courage that it is no wonder that many of us, day after day, give space for that which gives us neither comfort nor pleasure. It is no wonder that we accumulate and accumulate seemingly without our own volition.—Mary Stewart Cutting in Harper's Bazar.

Unworried.

The Duchesse de Berry, whose husband was the son of Charles X of France, was driving with her husband when the horses took fright and ran away. The duchess had continued the conversation without changing the tone of her voice, and at last her husband exclaimed:

"Why, Caroline, do you not see what has happened?"

"Yes, I see. But as I cannot stop the horses it is useless to trouble about them."

The carriage was upset, but no one was hurt.—Youth's Companion.

His Granddaughter Objects.

Miss Ethel Dickens, a granddaughter of Charles Dickens, is reported to be violently opposed to the project now on foot in England of erecting a statue to the memory of the novelist. She calls attention to the fact that her grandfather in his will distinctly said that he was to have no "monument, memorial or testimonial." Miss Dickens is the head of a large typewriting bureau in London and is described as a keen business woman.

Eating at Bedtime.

Do you go to bed hungry? This is not a good thing to do. Nothing should, of course, be eaten which is hard to digest, but something should be taken to stay the stomach's craving and insure sleep.

Wafers and warm milk, hot water and brown bread or a few dates are all good. They should be eaten slowly. If they are not well digested, instead of inducing sleep they will cause wakefulness.

Don't Do It.

Dr. Weir Mitchell declares that women often talk themselves into a nervous collapse. "Talking," he says, "reduces the vital force. One has only to lose one's voice temporarily to find out how many unnecessary remarks one makes."

With Roast Lamb.

For a delicious salad to serve with roast lamb sprinkle orange pulp with minced mint leaves, dress with lemon juice and sugar and serve on lettuce leaves.

When a dentist in China is extracting a tooth for a patron an assistant pounds on a gong to drown out the cries of the patient.

INDOOR GARDENING.

How to Raise Tender Plants From Seeds in the House.

In planting seeds of tender annuals in the house, shallow boxes, called flats, are required. These should not be over three inches deep, and for tender greenhouse plants two inches is enough. These may be of any convenient size, but should not be too wide to sit on the window sill, unless a shelf extends beneath the window sill on which they can rest. It is better, too, that they be small enough to accommodate but one kind of seed.

For all fine seeds a soil composed of leaf mold and fine, sharp sand should be used. This should be sifted and pressed down evenly. The soil should be moist when used, not wet or dry. Fine seed, like the Rex begonia, primrose, calceolaria and the like, should be merely sifted evenly over the surface of the soil and pressed down into the soil with a piece of smooth board.

The flats before filling with earth should have a few small holes bored in the bottom and these covered with bits of glass to prevent the soil washing into the holes.

After the fine seeds have been sown the flats should be set in a pan of tepid water until they have absorbed sufficient moisture to look dark, but not wet on top. They should then be tilted on the edge and all surplus water drained off, the flat covered with glass and a sheet of white paper and set where they can have a regular heat, from beneath if possible.

Coarser seeds should have a light covering of sifted sand pressed down over them, and still larger seeds should be sowed in drills an eighth of an inch deep and the displaced soil drawn back over them and pressed down.

How to Clean Brushes.

The secret of washing brushes successfully is to dry them quickly. Have ready two dishes, rather shallow and with enough surface to allow of holding the brushes parallel. Put hot water, in which you have dissolved soap and soda or ammonia, in one and cold water in the other. Immerse the bristles of the brushes in the boiling water, passing them from one side to another quickly and steadily without wetting the backs any more than possible. They will clear of dirt instantly without touching them with the hand or with a smaller brush, which is what gets the bristles out of shape. Rinse in the cold water and add a few drops of lemon juice to it if the brushes show any tendency of getting yellow. Dry them by setting on a newspaper, bristles down, over a radiator or register which is not too hot, and let them become thoroughly dry before using. Ebony backed brushes should be rubbed with a little linseed oil and polished with a soft cloth.

How to Clean a Dirty Sink.

Many women have been discouraged by the look of the iron sink that seems to be coated with a thick layer of rust and grease that no amount of washing will remove. There is little difficulty in removing this, however, if kerosene is used. Plenty of the kerosene should be used, and the best time to apply it is at night, so that no water need be drawn until the next morning, thus giving the kerosene time to do its work. The oil should be applied in a liberal coat, and in the morning it should be wiped quite dry. As a rule, one application is all that is necessary, but with a sink that has been badly neglected several applications may be necessary. After the grease and rust have been removed the sink should be wiped dry at least once a day to keep it smooth and shining.

How to Strop a Razor.

"Lead pipe will keep your razor sharp," confided the garrulous barber. "Get a short piece of the smallest, softest lead pipe your plumber has in stock and keep it handy when you are stropping the razor. The scheme is to rub the strop with the pipe. It works best with a plain leather strop. Apply the pipe, just as you would strop the razor, to the unfinished side of the leather. Strop your razor on that side, wind up with a few passes on the finished side of the strop, and you will have a first class edge on the tool. I never took the trouble to get a scientific explanation of the virtues of lead pipe as an aid to whetting, but it is all to the good in that respect."

How to Cure a Bad Cough.

A simple, homemade cure for a bad cough or to relieve hoarseness is to be found by mixing ten drops of aromatic spirits of ammonia with a teaspoonful of glycerin. Stir the ammonia in with the end of a knitting needle so that it does not burn the throat.

If preferred, a bottle of this preparation may be mixed at once, using the same proportions. It should be kept tightly corked. This simple cure if taken in time will not only relieve a cough, but break up a threatened bad cold.

How to Make Mutton Pies.

Cut and mince very finely as much cold mutton as you will require for a certain number of pies—Moisten with cold gravy or stock, season with salt, pepper, a little minced parsley and, if not for children, a little anchovy sauce. Line some patty pans with good, short paste, fill them with the mixture, cover with the remainder of the paste and bake in a quick oven for a quarter of an hour.

Bordeaux Mixture.

The bordeaux mixture is the proper remedy to use for all fungous troubles—viz, mildew and rust of beans, potato and tomato rot and leaf blight, melon and cucumber diseases, asparagus rust, celery leaf blight and rust, etc. The half strength mixture two pounds copper sulphate, two pounds quicklime, fifty gallons water is strong enough to use in the vegetable garden kept for potatoes.

BURGLARS BUSY

Rats and mice troubled the ancient as they do the modern dwellers in the Hawaiian Islands. Menzies and his party from Vancouver's ships, who ascended Mount Hualalai, on the island of Hawaii, were greatly annoyed by these rodents in the hut where they passed a night. To reduce the number of the disagreeable animals the Hawaiian used a small bow and very light arrow. How early they invented the bow and arrow is not known, but they do not seem to have made use of this weapon in their wars.

THE results of Monday's election in this county and city cannot help but be satisfactory to every citizen, be he wet or dry, Republican or supporter of the Labor ticket. The advocates of prohibition cannot help but feel elated over the decisive victory gained, while their opponents, in the face of the enormous majority, are satisfied that it was the result of the people's deliberate judgment and not the result of a hurrah campaign. In the city the result proved that this a Republican city and the splendid way in which the Republicans got together and all worked for the success of their splendid ticket, laying aside their little grievances, cannot help but prove of vast benefit in the future. While the defeat of Mr. Iddings in the second is regretted, as it was universally admitted he would have proven a valuable man in the position, much credit is due him for making a sacrifice run. The defeat of Alderman Ward in the third, takes from the service of the city a man who made good and who leaves behind him a record of good faithful, hardworking labor and who will be missed in the council. The Labor party put up a strong ticket and, in the face of the united efforts of the Republicans proved themselves worthy opponents. Mr. Zeitler, who won as supervisor, can feel assured that the people of his ward, in an emphatic manner, placed the seal of approval on his past services, and the same is true of Mr. Webster in the third, who as a member of the council, made a record as a man whose name on any ticket was a power.

BY a decisive vote the people have spoken and Charlevoix county will be dry after the first of next May. A heavy responsibility has been placed upon our officials and it is the duty of every citizen to uphold them in what will be for awhile a hard task, while the COURIER was critized during the campaign by some of its friends for its position in allowing each side space. We believe that our position was right and on every public question we believe the people are entitled to have the arguments of every side presented to them. To those who say there was only one side, we answer, that while there is only one side to the question of doing away with the liquor traffic, there are two sides to the question of whether public sentiment is ready for it in certain localities. The vote proved it was in Charlevoix county and means that our officials will enforce the law and that the people are behind them.

A TANTALIZING CUP.

Interesting Experiment With Eggshell, Cork and Straw.

Tantalus, according to the legend, having offended the gods, was punished by being made very thirsty, having a cup of water placed continually just out of his reach. From this story we get our word tantalize. To make a cup of tantalus—that is, a cup that can be filled part way, but never to the brim—follow directions:

Get an empty eggshell and break off the large end of it, say half an inch down. Through the small end bore a hole just the size to admit a good, firm straw. Now hollow out one end of a cork so that the shell will fit in it, and through the cork bore a hole to admit the straw.

Run the straw up through the cork and into the shell for half an inch or so. Make all the joints tight with sealing wax and fasten the shell to the cork in the same way.

Cover the top of the straw in the shell with a thimble, which will rest on the bottom of the shell and almost, but not quite, touch the top of the straw.

Now, to make a little tripod for this apparatus stick the prongs of three forks in the cork and then place a tumbler under it. Pour some water into the shell. It will not run out through the straw at the bottom at first, but when it rises as high as the thimble it will begin to run, for it goes up under the thimble and enters the upper end of the straw, thus finding an outlet. By fastening a wire around the cork and bringing one end up to the edge of the cup a manikin may be held in the position of bending over to drink. Have the lips of the manikin just above the level of the water.

CAPTURING SNAKES.

How Serpent Hunters of the Tropics Secure Their Prey.

The capture of snakes is simple and comparatively free from danger, says the Chicago News. In the great swamps of India they are caught in the early morning, when they are still from cold. The natives use nets for the purpose or else press a stick against the back of the snake's back, thus holding it fast until they can put it away safely.

Another method is to surround a spot known to be full of snakes with nets during the dry season and set the underbrush on fire. The snakes rush for safety in all directions and fall in great numbers into the nets. This method is often used to catch the biggest species of snakes. Hagenbeck states that many specimens of such monsters received by him from Calcutta bear marks of burning.

The giant snakes of Borneo fall a prey to the native hunters after they have gorged themselves to such an extent on food that they can scarcely move at all. Nets are then thrown over them, and they are delivered to Hagenbeck's agents.

Some snake hunters of India rely almost entirely on their sense of smell for ferreting out their victims. These hunters set out in the cold of the morning, knowing, more or less, where the holes are in which the snakes live. By means of their keen sense of smell they can tell whether a snake is at home. They then dig it out and, as it is half frozen still, succeed easily in imprisoning it in their baskets.

GIVEN TO SCRATCHING.

Women Uncertain and Coy at the Polls Mrs. Philip Lydig's Guests Hear.

At a meeting of the Equal Franchise league of New York held recently at the home of the secretary, Mrs. Philip Lydig, the Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer explained to the members why politicians didn't want women to vote.

"Politicians object to the extension of the franchise to women," said Mrs. Spencer, "because no one can ever tell how they are going to vote. In short, their votes cannot be delivered. Wherever they vote they have evinced an indomitable determination to scratch. Hence they have introduced delightful and salutary uncertainty into politics. You may count upon their not voting, as our friends the enemy have admitted, for saloon keepers or drunkards or any man who is allied for profit with the social evil, but you can't tell who they will vote for, and, whether they always vote wisely or not, this is a distinct and valuable contribution that women have made to politics."

"I suppose you don't expect the millennium when women vote," said Miss Mary Garrett Hay when the time came for questions. "I don't, and I am not asking for a vote for that reason. Miss Anthony used to say that women ought to have votes, even if it made things worse, simply as a matter of justice."

"That is a good basic principle," an makes a stronger appeal to most people than abstract justice. Few deny the justice of giving women an equal voice with men in the direction of public affairs, but they don't see the use of it."

Before the meeting adjourned Mrs Gabrielle Stewart Mulliner came in from the hearing on the proposed woman's court before the Page commission and at Mrs Lydig's request told the audience about the triumph which she believes the women have scored.

The Equal Franchise league expects to send a delegation to Albany for the women suffrage hearing on March 23 and will hold a council of war in a few days for the purpose of selecting representatives.

NEW PUNTO TAGLIATO.

The butterfly design seen in the illustration was designed by an Englishwoman, Miss Louise A. Pelds, who has written a book about it. It is the new punto tagliato embroidery, which should not be confused with the old Italian lace of the same name.

TRIFLES THAT COUNT.

Half a lemon dipped in salt will do wonders in polishing brass and copper cooking utensils.

A cup of sweet milk added to the water in which oatmeal is cooked makes it much richer and adds to the flavor.

Damp shoes are usually hard to polish. Try adding a drop or two of melted paraffin to the blacking, and they will polish up at once.

A simple way of testing eggs is to add two ounces of salt to a pint of water and put the eggs in it. Good eggs will be found to sink, while doubtful ones will float.

Candle grease may be readily removed from a cloth frock or a coat by laying blotting paper over the spot and applying a hot iron. The blotting paper absorbs the grease when the heat is applied.

Dry the tender leaves and small ends of the stalks of celery and keep for flavoring purposes. Parsley should be first dipped in boiling water—to make it a bright green—then dried in the oven.

Relief from choking may be had by swallowing a raw egg immediately. This will generally carry a fish bone or other obstruction down which cannot be removed from the throat by the utmost exertion.

The leaves of a rubber plant should be washed once or twice with milk. This makes them glossy. Give the plant rich soil, drain it well, never allow it to get dry at the roots and keep it from the direct rays of the sun.

Something New in Prizes.

One of the favorite "bridge" prizes among the fashionable set this season is a silver automobile flower holder. These attractive novelties have met with great success since their introduction, not long ago, and nearly every smartly equipped limousine car has a decorative attachment of this style. Many of the holders are conical in shape, though other designs are straighter, with fancy ornamentation in embossed work, in engraving or in jewel setting. The tiny silver vase is attached to the inside of the car, either in the corner or below the window frame, and can be removed quite easily. It will hold either water or damp wood, and flowers placed in the receptacle retain their freshness several hours. It is the fashion, of course, for each woman to have her favorite flower in her car. A "bridge" prize of this kind can later be decorated with the winner's initials.

The Pine Tree's Secret.

The pine tree lifted his proud head high,
While the frolicking winds went trooping by—
The boisterous winds that high and low
Had tramped that morning over the snow
They had climbed to the top of the bleak round hills,
Had loitered to jeer at the captive rills.
"Oh, ho!" they cried to the pine tree old
"We can guess, we can guess what your great arms hold!
They are empty nests, for away on wing
The nestlings have flown where the south winds sing."
The pine tree sighed—he had grown so wise
From the old white owl with the blinking eyes—
The pine tree sighed, but he whispered low
To the sunbeams merry that danced below
A secret we, who are friends, may know.
The winds went on with rollicking shout.
They scattered the brown little leaves about,
And they never knew, nor do to this day,
What the faithful pine kept hidden away
But the sunbeams merry, he welcomed them all
They climbed, with never a fear or fall,
Higher and higher, where, lo, on his breast
The brave old pine held a warm, round nest.
The sunbeams smiled as he gave them a peep
Three small flying squirrels fast asleep
Round and fuzzy and puffy and gray.
While mamma squirrel had flown away
On her funny flat wings from tree to tree
To bring some nuts to her babies three.
The winds heard only the pine tree's sigh,
But we know him better, you and I

THE BOY AND THE LAW

Title of Lecture to be Given by Judge Brown Friday Evening.

This Is an Event no Resident of Charlevoix Should Miss.

The above is the title of the lecture to be delivered by Judge Willis B. Brown, Friday evening, April 9, now of St. Louis, Mo., formerly Judge of the juvenile court of Salt Lake City, Utah.

Our experience teaches us that these two are antagonistic and that from the standpoint of the average boy the law is his sworn enemy. How to reconcile these two and transform the enemity into friendship and loyalty to the rightful authority is the problem that is more and more engaging the attention of thoughtful people. Especially is this true where by accident of birth and environment the boy nature has been given a criminal turn.

The juvenile courts which are springing into existance so rapidly testify to the interests that is being taken in the boy criminal and his reformation. To Judge Brown, more than to any other perhaps, can rightfully be given the credit for this movement. His methods while judge of the juvenile court in Salt Lake City produced such startling results and succeeded in transforming so many seemingly hopeless criminal lads into clean, wholesome, law abiding boys, some of whom have since taken their places as honored citizens in their several communities, gave an impetus to this method of dealing with boys which is going forward with ever increasing force and widening area.

Judge Brown is a genuine lover of boys, so much so, that he gave up his position as judge and is now and has been for several years, giving himself completely to this work. His earnings in the lecture field are very large and he devotes them all to the promotion of the various plans which he has evolved for the betterment of the great American boy.

The Boy's City, which is to come to Charlevoix this summer, and to which the attention of the citizens of Charlevoix has been directed for the last few days, is one of the plans which he has for the betterment of the boys as a whole. In this lecture Judge Brown will tell us how he became interested in this work, what plans he has adopted and what the results have been made.

We have no hesitation in recommending him unreservedely to the people of Charlevoix and promise them a rare treat. Heretofore it has been impracticable to obtain the Judge, although he has been considered in every lecture course which has been selected, for the simple reason, that his popularity and the great demand for him, has enabled the Lyceum Bureau, under whose auspices he has been heretofore delivering his lectures to put a price upon him which was prohibitative to Charlevoix.

Under the peculiar circumstances attending the coming of the Boy's City to Charlevoix, the Lecture association has been able to make special terms with him and to put the price of admission to the lecture so low that everybody can attend.

The admission will be 35 cents including reserved seats which will be on sale Thursday morning, March 8, at 8 o'clock at the Ivy Drug Store.

Preparing Wool For Market.

Many farmers, says a wool buyer, are losing up to 2 cents a pound in their wool by not paying attention in preparing it for market. There are cases where it might just as well be put into a hole with a pitchfork and trodden down. Practically everything goes in together—fleece, bellies, locks, tags, short and long staple, fine and coarse, Merino and crossbred. Now, what can a buyer make out of this? How can he tell the proportions of each in a bale? The consequence is that only a low value all around can be risked, and many buyers will not bid for it at all.

Horse Boot For Soft Land.

A popular style of horse boot used to cover the horse's hoofs while walking on lawns, bogs and other soft soil is shown in the illustration. It is made of leather and is slashed so as to be drawn tightly together about the hoof and buckled over the shoe. The sole is sometimes made of sole leather, but for field use where the land is very light and spongy this sole is also shod with wood to increase the size considerably and thus give the hoof a greater bearing surface, so the animal can walk without sinking into the land.

Grounds For Complaint.

A man entered a restaurant and asked for coffee. After he had finished his repast he called the waiter and said:

"Waiter, this coffee has its good points and its bad points. One of its good points is this—it has no chicory in it."

"Yes, sir," replied the waiter, quite gratified. Visions of a handsome tip floated up before his mind's eye, and he rubbed his hands gleefully.

"But," resumed the customer, "it's bad point is this—that it has no coffee in it."

CRANE'S

This Store Policy Should Interest You

This store is conducted on such a basis that you will find yourself safe in saying,

"When I want anything of which I am not a judge, I go to Crane's. If they say a thing is all wool, it is all wool."

Absolutely nothing is misrepresented here. Our clerks are instructed to learn all about the quality of all the articles they handle and to answer all questions truthfully.

When we buy, we make it a rule to buy nothing of which we are not sure as to quality—the wool must be all wool—the linen must be pure linen.

We buy nothing which will not be a credit to us. We want you to feel satisfied with the quality of every article bought of us.

If you feel that any merchandise bought from us is not right in every way we prefer that you should let us replace it to your satisfaction.

There will soon be no more of the great Ward farm at Frederic provided the present decision of the management of this estate is carried out. This farm lies on the hill east of Frederic and is one of the largest if not the largest farm in an improved state in the northern part of Michigan. The farm comprises, that is, that section known as the fruit farm, about 1,000 acres and it is all good land. This vast orchard has been famous for many reasons all over the country. It has been an immense producer in many ways and it has also been said to have been a farm which was more than ordinarily expensive to operate.

The West Side hotel, of Gaylord, one of the old land marks burned last week. It was known to every one who travelled that way during the last 30-odd years. The fire is presumed to have been caused by a defective chimney. The roof was all in flames when the blaze was discovered. The building was owned and the hotel was conducted by Mrs. M. Meston, who loses on building and contents about $4,000. She had a small insurance. The building adjoining and owned by Reuben Qua was damaged $700 covered by insurance. This building was occupied by Thomas Juras as a saloon. His loss is covered by insurance. Both were wood structures.

At the meeting of the western Michigan development bureau at Traverse City last week, one of the most vigorous promotion movements ever launched in Michigan was perfected. A final meeting to draw up all the loose ends will be held at Muskegon April 16.

At the meeting several new counties were added to send representatives. Additional members of the board of control were elected and a sufficient fund to promote the agricultural, horticultural, industrial and resort advantages of this section of the state was assured. Representatives of the Pere Marquette Manistee and Northwestern and Grand Rapids and Indiana railroad companies and the Northern Michigan Transportation company were present and pledged their support to the movement.

The increase in the production of beet sugar in the United States has been very rapid in recent years. In 1897, the production of beet sugar was about 84 million pounds against 641 million pounds of cane sugar. In 1907, beet sugar production was 967 million pounds against 514 million pounds of cane sugar, the beet sugar production of 1907 being greater than that of cane sugar in any year in the history of the country.

According to the government seed report, it is best to buy seeds in Michigan as out of the great number of samples which were adulterated, none came from the seed men of the state. It is interesting to note also that the government states that one big Chicago mail order house didn't adulterate a Kentucky blue grass seed sample—they never put any Kentucky blue grass seed in it at all.

CAUSES DEBILITY

Here are Facts Backed up by a Strong Guarantee

Debility is caused by catarrh. In our opinion, a person free from catarrh was never troubled with debility. Debility can never be cured by medicine not designed to cure catarrh. We positively guarantee to cure catarrh and thus cure debility. In every case where we fail to effect a cure, we will not charge a cent for the medicine employed during the trial. Now, surely no one should hesitate to believe us or to put our claim to a practical test under such conditions. We take all the risk, no one else can lose anything by the transaction.

We make these statements and this offer because we know and have time and again proved that Rexall Mucu-Tone will cure catarrh. It is designed for that one particular purpose. It is not a cure-all prescribed to cure every disease that flesh is heir to. It is a specific. Rexall Mucu-Tone is absorbed in the stomach and carried by the blood until it penetrates every part of the body, acting as an antiseptic, disinfecting, cleansing, soothing and healing agent. The New Catechism

What is the chief lawbreaker of the land? The saloon.

Where are the schemes hatched which promote civic corruption? In the saloon.

Where does the midnight assassin go to prepare for his murderous work? To the saloon.

Where do the police go in search of the skulking thief and murderer? To the saloon.

What lays its hands upon political parties and dictates who shall be nominated and elected? The saloon.

What impoverishes the industrious workman and fills him with the spirit of discontent and anarchy? The saloon.

What takes the bread from the mouths of starving children and women? The saloon.

What clothes with rags women raised in refinement and affluence? The saloon.

What despoils young manhood and sends it reeling and staggering down the street? The saloon.

What crowds our prisons to the utmost? The saloons.

What peoples almshouses and insane asylums with pitiable objects? The saloon.

What destroys the respectability and influence of men and sends them swaggering to a drunkard's grave and a drunkard's hell? The saloon.

What destroys more homes and causes more family troubles than anything else? The saloon.

What is the greatest enemy of church, the nation, the home and the individual? The saloon.

What is the greatest hindrance to all reforms and moral and material advancement? The saloon.

Can both the church and the saloon prosper in the same territory? No.

Can a man, knowing the awful work of the saloon, be a Christian and sign saloon petitions, rent property for saloons or vote for men committed to it? No.

Can any man prosper who spends his time and money in the saloon? No one but the saloonkeeper. He can; he does, too.

The saloon came from hell, and it will be driven back to hell some of these good days.—Pacific Christian Advocate.

Memorial

CARRIE C. BLANCHARD.

In loving remembrance to our darling daughter and sister, who died one year ago April. From father, mother, sisters and brother.

One long, sad year has passed away,
Still we are grieving from day to day.
For our dear one, so full of life and love,
Who has gone to dwell in heaven above.
Her glad, quick step we meet no more we hear,
Her soothing face in ours so dear,
Her willing hands, her voice so sweet,
In heaven some day we hope to meet.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is catarrh. Hall's catarrh cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. A Tip From the Japs.

"I miss some of the pictures you used to have hanging around," said her friend who saw her new apartment for the first time.

"I have put them away," the woman explained. "The Japanese do that, they say. They change their pictures every little while, and that gives the pictures a rest and you too. When you are in America do as the Japs do," she finished.—New York Press.

His Game of Patience.

By Gertrude Delancey.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

Old Captain Blanding had two absorbing passions in life—his love for cards and his love for his daughter Thais.

It was wonderful how many young men were willing to pass their evenings at the captain's house playing with him. He was a wary old opponent and all but invincible.

The young men came by twos and threes in their best tailor made suits, with posies in their buttonholes. Often they brought offerings to the captain's daughter.

Thais accepted the gifts and the too evident good will indifferently. Sometimes when a fourth hand was needed at whist she lent her aid. Otherwise she betook herself to the parlor and practiced as diligently as if there was not a man in the house.

Aunt Letty, Captain Blanding's widowed sister, kept house for him and mothered his otherwise motherless daughter. She was a gentle soul, large hearted and small minded, who made the best doughnuts in town. By the aid of her smiles and her cakes she encouraged eligible men to frequent the captain's house, hoping that some one of them would prove acceptable to Thais.

Thais' name had been given her because of an early fondness of her father for Greek literature. Thais, despite her name, did not lean toward scholarly achievement. She was a butterfly, very beautiful to look at and very difficult to catch.

She had read a little poetry and very many romances where the heroines were all beautiful like herself and the heroes proved their devotion by astounding deeds of valor. These men, who sat evening after evening with bits of red and black pasteboard between them, evidently lacked every heroic quality.

When one by one these timid adorers laid his heart at her feet she promptly trampled upon it and sent him away smarting.

When after a few evenings he did not again appear the old captain would wonder mildly what kept him away. Sometimes he asked the victim and received a stammered excuse.

By the time the young man's place at the card table was filled the captain had ceased to remember him.

It was Sheldon King who brought Billy Smith to the house for the first time. Billy was a newcomer in Kensington and wholly unacquainted. He was a little fellow with hair of no particular shade of brown, a square, plain face and blue eyes behind glasses. He had no stories to tell, no jokes to raise a laugh, and he had never handled cards before in his life.

It took him the entire evening to learn to play pedro, but he applied his mind to it with a will, and when he went away the captain slapped him on the shoulder and told him he would make a player if he kept at it. The captain always said that to the defeated, who sometimes chewed their lips over it bitterly.

The captain conceived a great liking for Billy, and they spent many evenings together. By spring Billy had learned all the games the captain knew and could even beat him at some of them.

He came obviously for the captain's sake alone, for he brought no offerings to Thais. He had his own way to make and an invalid sister to maintain at an expensive sanitarium. This much he told the captain and was forever after silent about his affairs.

Sheldon King presently, having had his wings badly singed at the candle of Thais' indifference, ceased to be seen at the captain's card table. But Billy came unfailingly. The captain was delighted with him.

Here at last was a man who did not play to one's humor, who beat one unmercifully if he could or was beaten without showing the white feather.

The second winter Billy's sister died. He stayed away two months, and the captain openly fretted for him. Then one evening Billy appeared with a box of the captain's favorite cigars. The captain fairly wept for joy at sight of him and shook his hand twenty times.

He called Thais to see who had come. Thais came, startled by the clamor and a little disgusted when she found only Billy. She gave him a cool little hand and a cool little smile and a cool little phrase of welcome, then returned to the piano and l'Chimiade. She did not understand Billy, who brought cigars to her father instead of bonbons to her.

Two years went by. The circle about the captain's card table had changed many times and had dwindled to an occasional widower, silly Tom Pike and Billy. One by one the other young men had mended their hearts and offered them good as new elsewhere.

The votive offerings that now came to Thais' shrine were far less frequent. Billy brought her nothing at all, but it was wonderful how many little things he found to present the captain with. He even gave Aunt Letty a beautiful crochet hook with a chased gold handle.

More years passed and more slowly for Thais. Chaminade had ceased to charm her, and she missed the excitement of past adoration. Mr. Sweet had gone away, and Tom Pike, in despair of winning Thais, had married a woman easier to woo. There were no new lovers forthcoming, for Thais was now generally labeled dangerous. Moreover, she had ceased to be the beauty of the time.

She had reached a very trying period of her life, being too old to go in the young set, too young to go in the old set and prohibited by reason of her maidenhood from the married set.

Her dreams did not, as in the past, satisfy her. Her hero, the ideal of her imaginings, had not come. She believed now he never would come. She began to sigh when she looked in the glass. Sometimes she saw herself quite old, sitting at table pouring tea for Aunt Letty or playing cards with her father and having no interest in life beyond these two daily duties.

Thais' ideas of life were changing. She discovered that Billy Smith had a good forehead and mouth and that his hair looked better with gleams of gray in it.

Billy still came to the house as unfailingly as ever. He was almost the only single man who did come. Unconsciously almost she began to look forward to his visits, and he often found her shuffling cards against his arrival.

Billy had brightened wonderfully in these later years. He told stories and jokes and the amusing gossip of the town. He was earning a large salary and was much sought by mothers with marriageable daughters. But for some reason he continued to be free and to play cards at the captain's.

One evening he found Thais alone. She begged him rather shyly to stay, and he stayed. They sat down at the card table, and Billy dealt the pack for pedro. They played as for dear life, scarcely speaking. Then by means of a lucky ace Billy won.

He looked across at Thais, but her eyes were down. Something in her face, however, lent him courage, and he caught her hands, which were absently engaged with the cards.

"Thais!" he commanded. She looked at him.

"I win!" he said triumphantly.

"Yes," she faltered.

"It has taken a long time," he said presently. "Thais, I have never given you a present. But I have one for you which I have carried with me constantly for several years. May I give it to you now?"

"Yes," Thais said meekly.

When he had put the ring upon her finger he leaned forward and kissed her.

"It has been a long game," he said, "and one that required bits of patience and determination. You see, dearest, I fell in love with you the first time I saw you, and I made up my mind to have you, God willing. The only way I could make myself welcome here was to play cards. So I played. You'll never ask me to play cards with you after we are married, will you, dear?"

"Why not?" asked Thais wonderingly.

"Because I loathe them and have loathed them since the first game I ever learned."

"Oh, Billy!" Thais said.

And then and there she realized that the man of her heart was indeed, after all, a hero.

Baring Feet at Worship.

The India Hindoos and Mussulmans alike wear both sandals and shoes (slippers) and the latter boots also. The sandal (the word is Persian) was evidently the original covering for the feet over all southern and eastern Asia, while the shoe was probably introduced into India by the Persians, Afghans and Mongols, together with the "clip tilted" (Hittite and Etruscan) boot.

Both are usually made in India of leather, but never of pigskin, and, while the shoes are always colored red or yellow, the boots are generally brightly particolored, both among the upper classes being also richly embroidered in gold and silver and variegated silk thread and with bangles, bugles and seed pearls after the manner of the ancient Persian boots represented on Greek vases.

But, of however rare and costly elaboration, the invariable rule is to remove them after entering a private house just when stepping on to the mat or carpet on which the visitor takes his seat. They must be cast off, the right boot or shoe first, before the worshiper enters a temple or mosque, and it is still regarded as an absolute profanation to attempt to enter either fully shod.—London Athenaeum.

Keeps His Word.

A traveling man stopped at a little town in Arkansas, and while there he made inquiries of the postmaster as to the integrity and honesty of a certain doctor who lived in the next county.

"What sort of a man is Dr. Briggs?" he queried, "is he a man that can be trusted a good doctor?"

"Well," answered the postmaster thoughtfully, "that depends. He's been doctorin' 'roun' here for some years now—ain't doin' much lately, though. Seems he was sent for to go to see ol' Mis' Henderson, what's been dyin' for goin' on thirty year. Ol' lady had the neuralgy pretty bad. Doc' he gives her a dose o' laud'num, an' he says, 'Mis' Henderson, you'll go to sleep now, an' you won't be bothered with the neuralgy no mo'.'

"She went to sleep; that was las' May, an' it's gittin' to'rds fall now. She ain't waked up yet, an' she ain't never been bothered with the neuralgy either. As a doctor I guess Briggs ain't much, but he always keeps his word, sir—always."

A Homemade Mouse Trap.

If you have got no cat and find the mice in your house getting altogether too bold for comfort, or if you would like to keep some mice for pets, we can tell you how to make a trap in which to catch them.

Over the top of an earthenware jar fasten a piece of writing paper, tightly binding it with a string or elastic band. In the center of the paper cut a cross, as shown in the illustration. Set the jar in the closet and suspend by a string a piece of toasted cheese over the center of the jar. If there are any mice in the closet the bait will attract them, but just as soon as the first mouse reaches the center of the paper he will drop into the jar and the paper will fly back into place again, ready for the next comer. A trap arranged in the same manner can be used for the capture of field and harvest mice, which make odd and amusing pets.

A barrel covered with stiff brown paper can be used for common rats, but they will gnaw out unless the barrel be partly filled with water.

How to Clean Velvet Hats.

Velvet hats can be cleaned and restored under the following treatment: Gently rub light blue velvet with a flannel previously dipped in kerosene, or if the material be soiled in spots only rub with a little butter. The wrong side requires drawing over a hot iron in order to raise the pile. Some people have also succeeded very well by just brushing with cornmeal until the soil was removed. Your black and colored velvets, if not dirty, but only creased, can be freshened by holding wrong side down close to, but not on, a hot flatiron on which has first been placed a damp cloth, the steam eradicating the creases and raising the pile. When it has been steamed all over remove the wet cloth and draw the velvet on the wrong side over the iron to dry it. Milliners do it just that way.

Eau de cologne, invented by Johann Maria Farina over 200 years ago, is composed of oils of neroli, citron, bergamot, orange and rosemary.

Violets and Science.

By LUCY M. DELAINE.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

When Mabel Baskerfield married Herbert Ward, scholar, learned professor, twenty years older than herself and apparently as serious minded as Mabel was frivolous, all their mutual friends and acquaintances held up shocked hands, figuratively speaking, at the seemingly ill assorted match.

"How had it ever come about?" one of the many dear friends asked, and "How long will they live together?" asked the more frankly cynical.

One month passed by. "Oh, well, of course, the honeymoon!" doubters laughed, and then another and yet another month passed apparently serenely, and another and yet another, until six months had come and gone without any "drifting apart," as Herbert's literary colleagues had predicted, or any indication on Mabel's part that she had wearied of her staid, scholarly husband.

The marriage had taken place in the fall—in the first week in November—and now had come April, with its days of sunshine and shadow, its first blooming crocuses and bluebells, its quick coming rains and as quickly dispelling sunshine.

HE EXCLAIMED, "WHY, MABEL, DID YOU WANT ME?"

Then gossips began to say that matters were turning out just as was to have been expected. Herbert Ward passed most of his time in his class room or study, and Mabel seemed absorbed in dinner parties, bridge whist and all kinds of amusements, making polite excuses for her husband's absence from functions she attended, saying, "Mr. Ward is so busy he could not accompany me."

She always seemed quite cheerful and contented—just the same merry, pleasure loving creature she had always been—but on one delicious spring day in April Mabel left early a luncheon she had been attending, pleading another engagement.

One of her friends attempted to rally her on leaving the party so early, saying, "Now that you are married, Mabel, we shall soon find you giving us up entirely, and you will be taking up some abstruse study or will become so domestic that we shall lose you completely."

"Am I married?" Mabel retorted, with half laughing question, and then added hastily: "Well, so I am, but it does not seem to make so very much difference after all. Do you think it does?"

Not waiting to hear the replies this query provoked, Mabel, hastily picking up her gloves and the light feather boa she wore with her dainty spring costume, started off briskly.

Out of sight of her friend's house her footsteps lagged, and a serious look came into her large soft brown eyes. As she walked slowly, pensively along her face would have betrayed to any one who might have chanced to see her that some serious matters engrossed her thoughts.

A river flowed through winding, tree lined banks about the little city, and Mabel crossed the bridge and soon found herself gathering handfuls of early violets. A group of white birch trees that grew closely together attracted her gaze, and toward them she made her way.

As she approached the spot she saw lying stretched out upon the grass a man's figure, his arms beneath his head and his face apparently lifted toward the blue of the tender sky.

Some sound of her approach must have reached the ears of the man, who had evidently, like herself, sought a quiet spot for meditation. Turning his gaze toward her, he rose and exclaimed:

"Why, Mabel, did you want me?" And before she had time to reply Herbert Ward, for it was he whom Mabel had roused from his reverie, said, half wistfully, half smilingly: "No; I see you were not looking for me. You were just taking a walk this lovely spring day, and the violets on this river's bank attracted you."

But Mabel gazed silently at her husband. Seeing him so unexpectedly, she had looked at him at first as a stranger might have done, and in her first surprised gaze she had noticed how tired he was looking—so weary or despondent or disappointed, she thought to herself.

Without answering his query Mabel lifted to his face her serious eyes, and, looking at him questioningly, she said:

"Herbert, you are not well. Is anything the matter?"

"Not well! Nonsense!" he replied hastily. "I am perfectly well. What put that idea in your head?"

"I don't know," she answered, "but seeing you just now so unexpectedly sad lying down on the ground, as if you were resting, made me think perhaps you were not well."

"No, Mabel," he answered, looking at his wife as she stood before him with her hands filled with the flowers she had gathered. "No, Mabel; I am just growing old, I suppose. That must be what you feel, what you notice about me. Poor child, it is 'May and December,' I fear, with us, Mabel. I am too old for you. I should never have allowed you to become my wife.

"I have noticed for some little time how quiet and changed you are from the happy, light hearted girl I married. It is natural and all my fault, for I was old enough to know better," he ended.

"Nonsense, Herbert. Why do you talk of being old? You are not old," she answered.

But Herbert, taking Mabel's hands, still filled with her flowers, in both of his own, stood tall and straight and broad shouldered before her as he said very seriously:

"Mabel, it is like you in your kind heartedness to try to convince me that you are not well aware of the too great difference between us—between our ages. You have tried to be gay and light hearted as you used to be—that I know well, for I have often seen you rouse yourself from what I knew must be sad thoughts—but the fact remains that you are not happy, and, as I said before, the trouble is that you are in the springtime of life, and I—well, I have passed into the cold and loneliness of winter."

Dropping her flowers unheeded to the ground, Mabel came close to her husband's side, and, putting both hands on his shoulders, she looked up into his eyes as she said:

"My husband, do you not know why I have been more quiet perhaps than I used to be? It was because I thought you found me silly and frivolous and too young to be your companion. I love you as I have always loved you, whether you are forty or sixty or eighty or a hundred. What difference does it make, the years that are past? Come; it is the springtime. We will gather the violets together."

And as Herbert looked searchingly into the face of the now smiling Mabel what he read there convinced him that in true love's season it is always spring.

His Opportunity.

A lineup of jurymen appeared before a certain judge one day, and every man explained that it would mean disaster to him to serve at that term of court—all but a little fellow at the tail end of the line. This man was a hunter, and he had lived in a cabin on the creek all his life.

"Have you no excuse to offer?" asked the surprised judge.

"No, sir."

"Haven't you got a sick mother-in-law needing your attention?"

"No, sir; I ain't married."

"What about your crop?"

"Don't raise anything."

"No fence to fix up?"

"Haven't got a fence on the place."

"You think you can spare the time to serve on a jury two weeks?"

"Sure."

The judge sat awhile and meditated. Reaching over, he whispered to the clerk, who shook his head in perplexity. Then the judge's curiosity got the better of him.

"You're the only man who's got the time to serve your country as a juryman," he said. "Would you mind telling me how it happens?"

"Sure not," said the little man promptly. "I heard you was going to try Jake Billings this term. He shot a dog o' mine once."

Still In the Business.

Lord Kames, a once famous Scottish judge, on his way southward to Perth from the northern circuit had to spend the night at Dunkeld. Next morning he made for the ferry across the Tay, but, missing the road, asked a passerby to show him the way.

"With all my heart," said the stranger. "I see your lordship does not know me. My name's John Gow. Don't you remember me? I had the honor to be tried before your lordship for sheep stealing."

"Now I recollect you, John," replied the judge. "And how is your wife? She, too, had the honor to appear before me for receiving the sheep, knowing them to have been stolen."

"Ah, we were very lucky to get off for want of evidence, but I am still in the butchering business."

"Then," quoth Lord Kames as he came in sight of the ferry, "we may have the honor of meeting again."

Keeping In Practice.

"You have broken my heart," sobbed the young wife after their first quarrel.

"I always was a heart breaker," jauntily replied the young husband.

"But you have broken mine for the last time."

"What—going to deprive yourself of so much pleasure?"

Pitiable.

"They are very respectable, though."

"Dear me!"

"What?"

"I did not think that they were that poor."

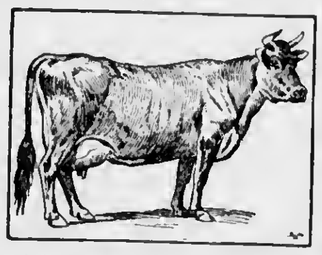
PROFITABLE DAIRYING.

Some of the tests made in the dairy departments of the agricultural colleges have opened the eyes of owners of cows and done an immense amount of good. These college tests not only disclose the pauper cow; they discover some astonishing profit producers. The selection and feeding of these great producers have usually been under college instruction. Dairy students are taught the importance of recognizing the dairy type, so that they may tell by the looks of a heifer calf what kind of dairy cow it will make; of a cow, what kind of producer she will be; of a bull, what kind of dairy progeny may be expected from him. The result has been the building up of many very profitable dairy herds.

Writing on this subject, in Collier's Weekly, Milton O. Nelson says: The first and foundation advice given by the college to the cow owner is: Know your cow. Test her. Is she in good health, so that she can give wholesome milk? Does she give milk in paying quantity? Does she give milk of paying quality? Thanks to college investigation and discoveries, any one can cheaply test his cow for tuberculosis and also for the butter fat and cheese content of her milk, while any good scales will tell the amount of her yield. With these tests any farmer may know how his cow compares with the model cow. By measuring her feed and calculating its farm value he can determine whether she is a profit maker or a pensioner.

The average farmer is too slack to make these investigations, but the colleges are making extensive tests of average dairy herds and advertising the results in order to wake the farmers up. The Illinois college, for example, made an entire year's test of 551 cows in thirty-six herds and found that the lowest one-fourth in the list (139 cows) averaged to yield annually but 133 pounds of butter fat each. The highest one-fourth produced 301 pounds. This product at 23 cents a pound, the average Elgin price for butter fat for the past five years, showed the year's gross receipts for the low class to be but $30.77 and for the high class $69.32. The average annual cost of keeping each of these cows was not less than



A CHAMPION COLLEGE BRED JERSEY.

$30. At this rate the low grade paid a profit of but 77 cents each for the year, or a total for the 139 cows of $107. The high class cows made a profit of $31.32 each, or for the 139 a total of more than $4,000 for the year.

There is many a chance for a slip between the possession of a good milk cow and the securing of a profit from her production. And here the colleges have undertaken to guard the cow owner. Dirt is his greatest enemy, and against this the colleges are making their most stubborn fight. Clean stables, clean cows, clean milk receptacles and clean men are essential to the production of clean milk. Stalls in which cows are compelled to keep clean and yet are comfortable are in use in college stables. Feeding of dusty fodder or raising dust in any way at milking time is to be guarded against. The cows are to be sponged or wiped with a damp cloth on flanks and udder just before milking. The milker is to come to his work with clean clothes and clean hands. The pail should be covered, except a four inch opening, and should be readily cleanable.

The secret of clean milk is, of course, to keep dirt out of it. The Michigan College of Agriculture has found that as many as 3,600,000 germs may fall into an open pail in five minutes of milking under ordinary stable conditions. The Connecticut college finds that the covered pail excludes 63 per cent of the dirt. The Maryland college finds that milk pails and other receptacles can be practically sterilized and cleaned with warm water and washing powders. These facts put it within the power of the small dairyman and farmer to keep the milk clean (and so make dairying profitable) without the expense of live steam sterilizing and the other costly laboratory processes of the "certified milk" dairies. These guards against dirt have been shown by these colleges to be the prime essentials in the making of high grade butter and cheese.

BREEDING DRAFTERS.

How It Might Be Taken Up by Farmers Successfully.

In my mind, says a breeder, the best horse breding proposition for the farmer is this: Let a dozen or a score of farmers organize and by a majority vote decide which one of the draft breeds they prefer, then each put in sufficient money to pay a thoroughly competent and reliable man to purchase a first class stallion (domestic, if posible) of this breed. Compel the member who takes care of him to take two shares, to insure the best of care.

If possible, get the local veterinarian financially interested and let all points be decided absolutely by him, the caretaker and president as a committee. Then let every man sell what horses he possesses and, if needs be, borrow the money and purchase a team of mares. The dairy farmer must look here for a large portion of his profit.

No two cows can be fed alike. Each must be studied separately. Increase the protein in the ration and watch the milk flow.

Test Each Cow Separately.

There is no easier way to find out the accurate production of each cow than to weigh and test the milk of each separately. This method is found simple and practical by those who have tried it, and their common verdict is that they receive much better pay for this than any other labor done on the farm.

The measure of milk will indicate its weight fairly well, but to be of value the measure must be exact, and it is much easier to weigh the milk than to measure it. Some may think they can estimate what a cow gives by noting how high up the milk comes in the pail, but this is nothing more than guessing and is far more liable to be wrong than even approximately right. The froth usually prevents seeing where the milk comes on the side of the pail, and as the froth varies in thickness at different times and with different cows it is very apt to deceive the guesser.

GLENN M. DUBOIS,
Lecturer

South Arm Grange No. 815.

South Arm grange No. 815 met in regular session Saturday evening, April 3, 1909 with Worthy Master St. John in the chair. Worthy assistant steward and gate-keeper were absent. Thowald Peterson was balloted on an accepted. Recess after which Thowald Peterson was initiated in the first and second degrees. Recess, moved and carried that the Master appoint a committee to buy such things as would be needed for Pomona grange. Sisters Murphy, Liscum and Miles were appointed. The janitor was appointed to buy hay for horses and fix up the shed. Moved, supported and carried that a committee be appointed to buy such garden seeds as are not generally grown in the farm garden. The object was to have vegetables for the exhibit at the county fair. Bros. James Nice, Ralph Rumney and Reuben Murphy were appointed. Lecturer's hour was carried out with songs, readings and discussions. Thirty members present. The new badges for the degree team were received. They met the general approval of the team. Expenditures of the evening $11.60.

Deer Lake Grange No. 1269.

Deer Lake grange met in regular session April 3 with Worthy Master Barber in the chair.

George Scott and daughter, Mary Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Mann, Delbert McGeorge and Mrs. John Engerman ware initiated in the third and fourth degrees and three members were re-instated.

A fine program was given by Worthy Lecturer Helen Moses and all left for home after finishing a good supper with a bright prospect for the future and a jolly time.

Maple Grove Grange No. 1255.

Maple Grove grange met in regular session March 30, Worthy Master Strond presiding.

Lecturer's hour was taken up by music, reading and a discussion of the question of local option.

It was decided to hold a dance Friday evening, April 23; after which grange closed in due form.

INDIGESTION ENDS

Stomach Distress Vanishes Five Minutes Later

Eat Sausages and New Bread or Other Favorite Food Without Fear of Dyspepsia

You can eat anything your stomach craves without fear of a case of Indigestion or Dyspepsia, or that your food will ferment or sour on your stomach if you will occasionally take a little Diapepsin after eating.

Your meals will taste good, and anything you eat will be digested; nothing can ferment or turn into acid or poison or stomach gas, which causes belching, dizziness, a feeling of fullness after eating, nausea, indigestion (like a lump of lead in stomach), biliousness, heartburn, water brash, pain in stomach and intestines or other symptoms.

Headaches from the stomach are absolutely unknown where this effective remedy is used. Diapepsin really does all the work of a healthy stomach. It digests your meals when your stomach can't. Each triangule will digest all the food you can eat and leave nothing to ferment or sour.

Get a large 50-cent case of Pape's Diapepsin from your druggist and start taking today and by tomorrow you will actually brag about your healthy, strong stomach, for you then can eat anything and everything you want without the slightest discomfort or misery, and every particle of impurity and gas that is in your stomach and intestines is going to be carried away without the use of laxatives or any other assistance.

Prevention of Hog Cholera.

Dr. J. W. Connoway of the Missouri experiment station at Columbia has discovered a serum for the prevention of hog cholera. The serum is in the form of a vaccine, and if it is injected into the blood of a hog before it has become infected with cholera the hog becomes immune to the disease. The serum was discovered through the fact that when a hog has once recovered from an attack of cholera it is proof against another attack, even if it is exposed to diseased hogs, for it has developed something in its blood which makes it proof against the disease. The serum has been used on 1,500 hogs in different parts of the state, and very few have developed cholera after being properly vaccinated, although exposed to the disease. The serum is kept in supply by the agricultural department of the University of Missouri and will be dispensed free to the farmers of the state.

A Simple Remedy.

Editorial omniscience no longer exists in the big city papers. The several departments require specialists to take charge of them, and woe to the man who steps out of his own narrow field. Not long ago the woman who conducted the page devoted to feminine interests was sick, and a young man, a reporter, was called in to try his hand.

He soon distinguished himself. A letter came in inquiring how grease might best be removed from soup. He read it hurriedly, noticing only that it was an inquiry for the removal of grease. This was his answer:

"Soak a soft cloth in gasoline and rub gently till the grease is eradicated."—Youth's Companion.

MAKING A GOOD ROAD

Ground on Which It Is to Be Built Must Be Drained.

SHAPING IS MOST IMPORTANT

That of Finished Highways Should Be in Cross Section, Shallow Curve or Shallow Truncated Cone—How to Grade—Materials to Use.

Today a good road must be surveyed. It must circle or wind its way up hills instead of mounting them in defiance of the laws of gravity. It should not follow the primitive settler's path or the track of his cow. It must avoid creeks and swamps, and everywhere its grade should be foreseen with nearly as much care as is used on a railroad.

As a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, just so the greatest load which can be hauled over a road is the load which can be hauled through the deepest mudhole or up the steepest hill on that road. The cost of haulage is therefore necessarily increased in proportion to the roughness of the surface or the steepness of the grade. This cost may easily be reckoned directly in time, loss of temper and wear and tear on the horse. Indirectly it amounts to tens of thousands of dollars.

The ground on which the road is to be built must be drained. This is variously done, according to different circumstances, but the fundamental requirement is side ditches. These, being lower than the bed of the road, receive the water from its surface as well as from its body.

On hills no "thank-you-ma'am" or breaks or hummocks should be constructed, but instead the road should be sloped so that the water will run to the side channels or, if necessary, be led to them by broad, shallow ditches cut diagonally across. Underground culverts from the uphill to the downhill side of the road should be built at frequent intervals.

If the highway is through low or springy land subdrainage as well as surface drainage is an absolute necessity. Dry roadbeds are as essential for good roads as dry powder for successful fighting. If water is allowed to get at the foundation of the road it undermines, freezes and eventually loosens the soil. Everybody who has floundered hub high through spring mud knows that this is only too true. Subdrains are in the end inexpensive. They may be constructed of field stone, of logs or fagots of wood or bundles of brush, of brick or, best of all, of tile and stone.

The general shape of all roadbeds, as well as of all finished highways, should be in cross section, a shallow curve or else a shallow truncated cone. In this respect, as well as in regard to drainage, lies the superiority of the modern over the Roman road. The aim today is to build a hard, smooth, well graded and well drained, waterproof and compact pavement on which wheeled vehicles may travel in safety and with speed. One inch to the foot is a successful curve.

The preliminary grading, after the stumps and large stones have been removed and the general "smoothing" has been done, is accomplished by means of the road machine, which may be adjusted so as to spread the earth, shave it away at the desired angles and roughly whittle the bed to the required form. By it also the side ditches are partly dug out. A road thus "crowned," or rounded off, even if nothing more is done to it, will give better service than its old, flat, undrained predecessor.

The next step is to roll the road with a heavy steam or horse roller till the surface is firm and hard. This process is slow and expensive, too, if we would keep the water from seeping through and prevent wasteful ruts and washouts it must be done. In some country districts where the use proposition is scant traffic is now admitted, and, although this earth road is the best permanent highway made, yet it is incomparably better than the former unimproved, wet and ungraded wagon track. Constant slight repairs will maintain such a road in good shape indefinitely.

All sorts of materials have been used in the construction of highways. Where stone is too costly some top dressing rolled firmly in tends to prolong the life of the road. Sand alone or clay alone is utterly impracticable. When mixed in the proper proportions and rolled, however, they make an excellent surface. Shavings, tanbark, the refuse of sugar cane, straw, flax and swamp grass have all been successfully utilized.

In the stone road the process as far as it goes is exactly the same. The roadbed must be surveyed, graded, drained, shaped and rolled. In general, two kinds of stone road are in use, the macadam and the telford, named from the two Scotchmen who first made practical application of their principles. In both broken stone is rolled to a compact, curved bed, flitingly drained. The main difference is that the telford road has a subpavement of hand laid rocks, over which smaller courses of gravel are spread and crushed. In both cases the stones must be fairly uniform and angular, so as to fit together under pressure. To cement this mass water and stone screenings, but never earth or clay, are rolled into the surface.

The qualities required of gravel to be available for constructing a macadam or a telford road are, above all, hardness and toughness. Stones containing flint or quartz, for instance, are bad, because, although hard, they are brittle. Most kinds of granite are undesirable, since they decompose rapidly, but the darker ones, containing hornblende instead of feldspar, are better. Slate and sandstone are useless. Some limestones are good, but the best material is trap rock. This is hard and tough. In case enough trap cannot be got an inferior stone may be used underneath and the trap for surfacing.

A stone road thus carefully constructed is no expensive undertaking, but once built lasts there for all time and serves all comers. Over a good road the traffic increases year by year.

The Dutch boy who stopped a flood by thrusting his arm into the hole in the dike understood the principle of water wear. This same principle applies to roads as well as to dikes. Once a channel is started destruction is sure to follow. A wheel rut cutting into an unforeseen soft spot or a patch of loosened stones may if unmended be the beginning of hundreds of dollars of waste. Nothing deteriorates so rapidly as a neglected road, and few things are so easy to maintain in perfect condition if slight continual painstaking inspection is allowed to rule.

In some southern states, especially those in the valleys of the Mississippi and its tributaries, burnt clay roads have been used. The process is simple. The clay roadbed is plowed up and roasted over open wood fires, much as bricks are baked. The "gumbo" or "buckshot" thus loses a good deal of its water and when mixed with uncooked clay and then thoroughly rolled forms a smooth and durable surface.—William Leavitt Stoddard in Youth's Companion.

ASPHALT IN ROCK ROADS.

An Improvement Suggested For the Use of Motor Cars.

States that are considering good roads are likely to be interested in the suggestions recently made in Washington by Amzi L. Barber, who has spent his life in the asphalt business. If it is at all feasible it would apply chiefly in thickly settled districts, and especially in the vicinity of cities, where motor cars, as in Jackson county, Mo., are beginning to wear out the highways.

Macadam has not stood up under the tremendous grinding of the heavy, high speed cars, and the Massachusetts highway commission and the federal government are conducting experiments to find a substitute.

Mr. Barber's suggestion, made at the annual meeting of the Independent Asphalt association in Washington, is that the problem could be solved by laying a strip of asphalt in the middle of a macadam road. Taking the average cost of making a sixteen foot macadam roadway at $10,000 a mile, Mr. Barber estimated the total cost of a sixteen foot road with a six foot strip of asphalt in the middle at about $13,000 a mile, an increase of 30 per cent.

"Horses can be driven on the macadam as now, if desired," Mr. Barber said. "Motor cars when the road is clear will have an ideal surface in the middle, equal to a bicycle path, with no ruts or lumps to look out for. When the cars meet they may slow down and turn out so as to run upon the macadam only on one side and for a few feet, and when rain "at falls on the asphalt, making it slippery. They can run with one side on the pavement and one side on the macadam to avoid skidding. When the strip of pavement in the middle they will cause neither dust nor wear.

"Finally, and if no other advantage were to be gained farmers can haul on the asphalt more than double the load that they can haul on macadam. This consideration alone should decide the matter in favor of the asphalt strip."

Mr. Barber expressed the opinion that the federal government ought to appropriate $20,000,000 a year for roads, to be apportioned to states providing three times the amount received.

New System of Roadmaking.

A new system of roadmaking which, it is claimed, will stand the wear and tear of heavy traffic, such as motor wagons, and be virtually dustless is to be tried on a more extended scale by the Lancashire county council in England. It has already been tested on short lengths of road, and after four years' hard use the road shows no sign of wear. It is made with small granite sets, three and a half to three and three-quarter inches, laid in intersecting circles. This method of paving is said to be much more economical than paving with ordinary granite. At the instance of the county council the system is to be tried on a length of main road between Accrington and Haslingden.

BETTER WINTER ROADS.

The Best Time to Do Good Work With the Drag.

As soon as summer is over and the ground begins to freeze the farmer pulls the faithful road drag into the barnyard, where it remains through the entire winter unused. Now, I believe if farmers will closely observe conditions they will see that winter road dragging will give us much better roads at the time they are usually the worst, says M. A. Tyerdell in Farm and Fireside.

The surface of the ground thaws many times during the winter season, and when it begins to freeze again, along some time in the afternoon or evening, the little lumps of dirt and the clods are neither too sloppy nor too hard, but just brittle enough to smooth down nicely, filling up the ruts and low places. This is the one and only time during the day that you can do good work with the drag, so keep your eye on the thawing and freezing process and govern your road dragging accordingly. With a little foresight and an hour's judicious dragging now and then there's no reason why we cannot have better roads in winter.

One Needs the Other.

The name split log drag itself implies cheapness, but cheapness doesn't mean an inferior article. Any one can have one, and good roads and split log drags are usually pretty close together.

Six Million Dollar Highway.

Governor Stuart of Pennsylvania will recommend that the legislature, which convenes soon, appropriate $6,000,000 for the construction of a state highway from Philadelphia to Pittsburg.

The rotifer is but an infinitesimal speck, about a thousandth part of an inch long. He is a water midge that needs a microscope to watch his movement. Ten thousand rotifers could sport in a tiny eggcup full of water without causing more commotion than would a single fish in any given bay. One would naturally suppose that such creatures were the most minute forms of animal life, but such is not the case. Wherever there is a "herd" of them they are accompanied by another species which are so small that in descriptions of the two they are likened to rats and horses. These tiny attendants on the Rotifer vulgaris are only one one hundred thousandth of an inch in length.—London Scraps.

CELEBRATION OF ARBOR DAY

Which Will Occur in Michigan, Friday, April 30.

PROCLAMATION BY THE GOVERNOR

Supplemented by Letters From School Officials

Urges that Patrons and Schools Get Together on that Day and Unite in Program.

To the People of the State of Michigan:

A third of a century ago Governor John J. Bagley by proclamation called the attention of the people of Michigan to the planting of trees as a duty devolving upon good citizens and urged the setting aside of one day in each springtime for that purpose. The custom has been followed by each executive since that time, and, in accordance with it, I hereby designate Friday, April 30, 1909, as Arbor Day. Every year emphasis the need of such a day and its observance should be state wide. The day should leave its influence and impress upon the minds of those upon whom the burdens of the future will devolve, and to this end, the exercises in the schools should be of a nature that will bring out and develop a love for the forest, field and flower.

It should be a day when attention is called to what a generous Providence has done for our state. A soil and climate adapted for all that makes a country beautiful and attractive is chief among God's blessings.

The splendid endowment of riches our state was given in its forests no longer exists in its entirety, but it was not to be expected that its resources of timber would not be drawn upon for the needs of our people. We can and should, however, by our efforts now, intelligent and energetic, provide resources for those who come after us that will prove that our mission here was not alone to use and distroy.

"Plant a tree" should be the watchword on April 30, 1909, and the farm roadside and the schoolgrounds should be an evidence from that date on that it was not simply a precept.

The Commission of Country Life appointed by President Roosevelt suggested that the people in the rural communities come together in their schoolhouses on Arbor Day and form an organization with the school as the center and meeting place, for the purpose of developing and making better the general life of the community. It is hoped that our state will be among the pioneers in this great movement, and I commend to the consideration of the people the suggestions and the program which has been prepared by the state superintendent of public instruction.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Great Seal of the state to be affixed at Lansing, this 26th day of March, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and nine.

FRED M. WARNER,
Governor.

By the Governor:
FREDERICK C. MARTINDALE,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF MICHIGAN. DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.

To Teachers in the Rural Districts of Michigan:

In August, 1908, President Roosevelt appointed a Commission on Country Life. The purpose of the commission was to inquire into the conditions of country life in the different states of the Union, get in touch with the people themselves and find out what they felt were their principal needs and hindrances. This commission served without pay and held thirty public hearings from Massachusetts to California, at which persons appeared from more than forty states. More than 125,000 answers were received to the printed list of questions about rural conditions.

The first purpose of the commission is to suggest some means of getting rid of the disadvantages of country life. The second purpose is to outline a plan for taking an inventory of the advantages and disadvantages of country life so that rural social conditions may be raised to the highest possible standard. The people of the country are the backbone of our nation. If, as some think, the young men and women are leaving the farms we should use every possible means to remove from the country life every hindrance and disadvantage.

It has been suggested by the commission that the country people all over the United States gather in their schoolhouses on some certain day and there discuss these various questions which are of vital importance to them. Governor Warner and the governors of several other states have issued a special proclamation in connection with the regular Arbor Day proclamation, suggesting that the people of the different communities meet on this day. It is my idea that the teacher in every seperate community shall take this matter up in connection with her regular Arbor Day program. I would suggest that you have a program of an hour or more in length, giving the first half of it to the children and their Arbor Day exercises and that the second half be given to the fathers and mothers for the discussion of some of the topics mentioned in the accompanying suggestive program. Every teacher will need to vary the program to suit the needs of the particular locality but this general outline may be followed. Let me urge upon every teacher the desirability of working out this plan in her district. If it is taken up in the right way I am sure that a great deal of interest and enthusiasm can be aroused. The matter rests very largely with the teachers. If they do not take it up, no one else will.

This meeting, in every locality, should result in an immediate permanent organization, with the adoption of a constitution and by-laws, the election of officers, and appointment of committees to see that work is begun at once along the lines most needed in the individual community. This association may be called by any name agreed upon but one that seems particularly well adapted is "Community-School Association" with the name of the school district or community prefixed. In the answers, received by the commission from the people of the different states the country school was mentioned by the great majority as the first thing that needed improving. This is particularly true in Michigan. It therefore seems logical that the schoolhouse be made the social center for the purpose of such an organization as here suggested and that the teachers should set the movement on foot. Let not your opportunity pass by for participation in such a great advance.

Let us suggest that you see that your special Arbor and Community School Day program is well written up in your local newspaper. It is hoped that in this way wide publicity will be given this new movement and abundant opportunity afforded for free discussion of these important topics.

If you desire a copy of the "Report of the Country Life Commission," write to Senator Julius Caesar Burrows or William Alden Smith, Washington, D. C.

Very respectfully,
L. L. WRIGHT,
Superintendent Public Instruction.

SUGGESTIVE COMMUNITY—SCHOOL ASSOCIATION PROGRAM.

1. Discussion of "The Commission on Country Life," its appointment, purposes.

2. Discussion of some urgent pressing need of district (new schoolhouse, repairs, or additions.)

3. Improvement of school property (beautifying of interior, exterior and grounds of school.

4. Advantages of a good library (establishment of library in district, circulating library.)

5. Establishment of clubs (literary, mothers' clubs, agricultural societies.)

6. Athletics and recreation in a school (establishment of permanent recreation grounds for community and school,—base ball grounds, tennis courts, running track, etc.) It is suggested that this topic be taken by a young man sufficiently interested in the subject.

7. The social side of country life. (Suggested that this topic be taken by a woman.)

8. Any other topic which might be timely or particularly interesting to the people of the community.

To Teachers and Patrons of Rural Schools:

Friday, April 30, 1909, has been designated by the Governor of Michigan as Arbor Day. Little or no interest has been taken in this day which should be one of the most

BURGLAR AT BOYNE FALLS

David Hunter Lodged in Jail Tuesday

Charged With Breaking Into Several Business Houses

David Hunter, who hails from Harrison Michigan, was arrested and brought over from Boyne Falls Tuesday, by Under-sheriff Meeker, on the charge of burglary. Hunter was seen loafing around the town during the day, and on the same night broke into four different business places and secured money to the amount of $79.86 from the following places:

In Meyer Bros. general store, till broken into and 30 cents in change taken; Pearson Bros., $14.50; saloon of John Lloyd, between three and four dollars in burnt pennies and all money in slot machines; Kellers' saloon, slot machines broken into and stripped of money to amount of about $6.00. The robbery was discovered early in the morning and alarm sent out. Under-sheriff Meeker took the first train south to Elmira and caught Hunter just as he was getting out of that place on a freight train. On searching him the officers found a sack containing $79.86, which is the total amount, as near as can be estimated, he secured from the business places he robbed.

The ladies' auxilliary of Marion Center Grange will serve a warm supper social at the grange hall, Friday evening, April 16. Pure maple syrup, biscuits, pickles and coffee. Bill 15 cents. Everybody come and have a good time. 15-tf

IMPORTANT DECISION

Handed Down By the Supreme Court Last Week

In Regard to Local Option Law in reversing Decision From Wexford

The supreme court last week handed down a decision that will set at rest all discussion in this state along a certain line of argument relative to the local option law. The court set aside Judge Chittenden's decision in the local option case of the People vs. William Peterson, found guilty in the Wexford circuit court of violating the local option law in furnishing beer to his guests at a dance held in his rooms over his former saloon last May. The decision as furnished by the clerk of the supreme court is in full as follows:

Supreme Court opinion, Filed April 6, 1909.

The People of the State of Michigan, vs. William Peterson.

Before Justices Ostrander, Montgomery, Moore, McAlvay, Brooke.

"The single question presented is whether the giving of liquor by a host to his guests by way of hospitality, in his own home, violates the provisions of Act 207, public acts 1889, known as the local option law. It is a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or by imprisonment, for any prrson to himself or by his clerk, agent or employe, directly or indirectly, manufacture, sell, keep for sale, give away or furnish any vinous, malt, brewed, etc., liquors, or to keep a saloon or any other place where such liquors are manufactured, sold, stored for sale given away or furnished, with an exception relating only to druggist and registered pharmacists. The object of the act is to prohibit the manufacture of, and all traffic in liquors. It cannot be reasonably construed so as to apply to the individual use or the keeping for use of liquors by citizens. Whether an individual might even in his own house, dispense liquor purchased and kept for his own use in such manner as to make his conduct obnoxious to the law is a question not presented. In this case respondent served eleven pint bottles of beer to a large number of guests who visited his home upon the occasion of the birthday anniversary of his daughter. It was a surprise party, the beer was not purchased for the occasion, and it is not claimed there was any intention to violate or to evade the law. The jury was told that the law had been violated and that they should find respondent guilty.

"The conviction is set aside and the respondent discharged."

The opinion was written by Justice Ostrander.

DIES SUDDENLY

Maxim Genett Prominent Norwood Pioneer

Had Been a Resident of Charlevoix County Since 1865.

Maxim Genett, one of the best known pioneer farmers of Charlevoix county, died suddenly at his home in Norwood Monday.

Mr. Genett was born in St. Lawrence county, New York, sixty-five years ago, coming to Charlevoix county in 1865, a short time after which he purchased the farm in Norwood where he died. Soon after coming to this county Mr. Genet was married to Rosa Mason, also of St. Lawrence county, who still survives. They were the parents of four children, three of whom are living, Plenay and Reed Genett and Mrs. Will Seymour, all of Norwood, one daughter, Louise, having died about a year ago.

By hard work Mr. Genett had made his large farm of 320 acres one of the best farms in Norwood township.

Mr. Genett was universally respected among his neighbors, being always ready to perform any act of neighborly kindness.

The funeral will be held at the Atwood Catholic church tomorrow.

MEMORIAL SERVICE

Held By W. C. T. U. at the Meeting Friday.

The W. C. T. U. meeting held at the home of Mrs. James McGeagh last Friday was largely attended and very interesting. Delegates were elected to the county convention at Boyne City, three new members were added to the membership making eleven new members in the past few weeks, and refreshments were served.

At the opening of the meeting a very beautiful and impressive memorial service was held in memory of Mrs. J. A. Hawkins who was among one of the first members of the union here, a sister beloved and esteemed and faithful to all lines of Christian work.

They leave us at the mystic river,
And one by one
They gather in the Father's Kingdom,
Till all the crown have won.
Farewell to earthly friendships greeting
To heaven they come,
Renewing their broken the circle
In an eternal home.

WE PLAY SQUARE

Motto of Citizens of National Boy City

Over Two Thousand Boys Expected There in July.

As announced last week, next summer will see the National Boys' City added to the many attractions of Charlevoix, the old Indian Camp ground having been selected as a site.

The question may be asked, what is the Boys' City? It is a plan thought out by Judge Willis Brown of the juvenile court of Salt Lake City, whereby boys from all over the country can get together and, while enjoying all the features of camp life, can be trained to take their part as citizens of this republic. During the latter part of July from two to five thousand boys from all sections of the United States will gather at Boys' City and all the life of a busy city will be taken up, the business of conducting the city to be entirely in the hands of the boys.

A daily paper, banks, post office, etc., will be established, a campaign and election of city officers held and entertainments, circus and all that goes to make up a busy city will be carried out entirely in charge of the boys themselves, under their motto, "We play the game square."

While all this will be under the charge of the boys, as it has been the past two seasons at Winona Lake, Indiana, and the boys themselves will work out their own problems of civic government, eminent men in different lines will every day hold conferences with them and deliver lectures, along the line of how to work out the boy problem.

Judge Brown, who probably understands boys better than other man in the world, will have general charge of the city along moral lines.

Dr. J. Elsom, Professor of Physical Training, University of Wisconsin, will have charge of the athletic and health departments and every boy will be carefully examined as to health, the political and civic department will be in charge of Hon. Frederick W. Mayne, of Charlevoix, and Hon. William A. Gardner, of St. Louis, Missouri. Other departments will be in charge of equally as eminent men in their line of work.

The business end of the city is looked after by a corporation composed of men of unquestioned business ability and an advisory council of some of the most distinguished men in the United States. Fred H. Brown, of St. Louis, Missouri, brother of Judge Brown will be in charge as business manager and it is expected that the work of preparing the ground for the city will commence next month and the latter part of July will see the city established in all its activity.

The Boyne Citizen comes out this week set with the new machine which Editor Baxter has just installed. This is the first type setting machine in the county.

LIQUOR MEN PUT UP FIGHT

Against the Canvassing of Local Option Vote

TEMPORARY INJUNCTION GRANTED

Case Was Heard by Judge Mayne Tuesday

Injunction Was Dissolved—Case Will be Appealed Drys are Confident of Victory.

Saturday afternoon an injunction was issued by Judge Mayne, of the circuit court, to restrain the board of supervisors from canvassing the local option vote. The petition for an injunction was signed by Leonard P. Adams and was filed by Lisle Shanahan of Charlevoix, the attorney for the liquor men in this county.

The petition, which was filed in chancery, asks for the injunction for the following reasons:

First; Because the vote was against the ordinance of 1787, which annexed the northwest territory, because it takes a person's property without due process of law.

Second; Because the ballots were not all of the same shade of paper, some being white and others of a yellowish cast.

Third; Because the local option ticket was in a seperate ballot, the claim being that it should have been on the same ballot with the good roads ticket.

Fourth; Because in some voting precincts seperate ballot boxes were used for the local option votes.

Fifth; Because South Arm voted with machines which had not been adopted by law.

Frank Chalompka and Herman Meyer both filed affidavits stating that they were confused by the different ballots and cast their votes with great difficulty.

Tuesday the case was heard by Judge Mayne, Prosecutor Nicholas appearing on behalf of the board and Hon. J. M. Harris on behalf of the election commissioners, Lisle Shanahan appearing on behalf of Mr. Adams.

After a hard fought legal battle the board basing their defense on the rule that the expressed will of the people could not be set aside on a mere technical point and that the ballots, as prepared, were designed to assist the voter in casting a vote in an intelligent manner, citing numerous authorities in favor of their position. The court handed down a decision dismissing the injunction, stating in substance, that the statue, on which the complainant based his action could be interpeted as directory as well as mandatory, and, until an adverse decision was given, the broad principle that the people rule would apply. The case will be appealed.

RESULT OF OFFICIAL CANVASS

NEW SUPERINTENDENT

I. M. DeVoe Accepts Position—A Very Wise Choice.

At the meeting of the Board of Education last week, I. M. DeVoe, teacher of science in the public schools, was elected superintendent of schools for next year. This will be good news to both patrons and pupils, as it means that the good work of Superintendent Woodley will be carried out by a man whose work in Charlevoix schools is proof of his ability. The board is to be congratulated on being able to secure Mr. DeVoe.

Looked Too Far.

There was an English farmer, a Somersetshire man, who once owned a telescope. The old man remarked to a friend at a local race meeting that the gentry nowadays had glasses for both eyes and added that he "had had one once for one eye, a right good one it was, but now it was no use at all—no, not to nobody."

"Why not?" asked the friend.

"Well," he said, "it were a good one. I could see miles wi' en. I could see plain the steeple of the church five miles off. But missus' son John, he borrowed en, and he tried to see the steeple of t'other church, ten miles off—and tried and tried and couldn't. And that strained it, and it were never of no use any more—no, not to nobody."

A Troublesome Mirror.

"Mamma," said Flossie, "this old looking glass isn't any good."

"Why, what's the matter with it, dear?" asked her mother.

"Every time I try to look in it," explained Flossie, "my face gets in the way."

As a Corollary.

"Are marriages made in heaven?"

"As to that I can't say, but I do know this much."

"What's that, Peleg?"

"There's lots of courting done in church."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Didn't Get a Chance.

She—What did papa say when you asked him for my hand?

He—Why, he couldn't say a word.

"He couldn't?"

"No; your mother was there!"—Yonkers Statesman.

The first use of the word "strike" in its present accepted sense occurred in the London Chronicle for 1765. In September of that year are numerous references to a great suspension of labor in the northern coal fields, and the colliers are stated to have "struck out" for higher wages.

THE ELEPHANT FLEET.

How It Is Used by the British Government In India.

Its elephant fleet is one of the strangest and most deadly departments maintained by the British government in India. It is a large fleet of coasting steamers specially built for the transport of elephants. India's population is one-fifth that of the entire globe. All these people use elephants. They use them for draft work and for tiger hunting, and in the arenas of the native states they even pit them against one another and against wild beasts. The elephant fleet transfers the animals from Dacca, the trapping and training headquarters, to the various districts whence comes the demand.

To get an elephant aboard ship is a difficult and dangerous task. The animal must wade through the surf to a stout raft, and this unknown surf, so white and tumultuous, often terrifies and maddens him. If in his fury he slaughters a mahout or two he cannot be greatly blamed. Once on the raft, his legs are tied to pegs, and the slow sail to the ship is uneventful. But now a great hand must be arranged under the elephant's belly, and a crane must hoist him up some twenty or thirty feet to the deck. Here again the elephant cannot be set down as intractable if, losing his head in that unprecedented aerial journey, he murders some more mahouts. Very prosperous, albeit stained a little with mahouts' blood, the elephant fleet for many years has plied up and down the Indian coast, embarking and disembarking its heavy, unmanageable freight.—New York Press.

The Appreciation of Music.

If we would appreciate music aright, we must remember that its beauty depends not upon the composer alone, but upon ourselves also. Deep calls unto deep, and the harmony of sound, though appealing primarily to the outward ear, must be answered by a harmony from within ourselves. The more culture we bring to the hearing of music, the wider our sympathy, the more exquisite will be the echoes which it awakens in the soul. If we would understand the composer's message we must co-operate with him. We must reach out to him with all our faculties, if we do that, the revelation of music will ceaselessly renew its beauty, ever turning unimagined aspects to gladden us.—Redfern Mason in Atlantic.

An Ugly Looking Lizard.

Among the lizards of Australia the "thorny devil" (Moloch horridus) is unrivaled in its ugliness. From the tip of its nose to the end of its tail this lizard is covered with tubercles and spines, but in spite of its dangerous appearance it is quite harmless. It measures about seven inches in length. It has a flat body, a small head and a cylindrical tail. It frequents sandy places, feeds largely on ants and is more or less diurnal in habits. Its powerful limbs are furnished with strong claws, which it uses in digging the sand, in which it often lies wholly or partially buried.

Defined.

"What is the difference between firmness and obstinacy?" asked a young lady of her fiance.

"Firmness," was his gallant reply, "is a noble characteristic of women; obstinacy is a lamentable defect in men!"

To clean a fan spread it on a towel and thickly cover it with black magnesia. Put a fold of the towel over it and whip lightly with the hands. Reverse the fan and treat the opposite side in like manner. A badly soiled fan can be cleaned with benzine and dry talcum powder.

Her Face of Youth.

By WILLIAM STANHOPE

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

"The Dead sea fruit of ashes, that is all life has meant for me. I wonder"—But here Mrs. Ellery St. John drew herself up with a start, "What!" she thought. "Talking to myself like an old woman! Really I must not be so much alone."

Being alone at all was new to Mrs. St. John. She had always been on the qui vive from her brilliant girlhood through the ten years of her married life and nearly ten of her widowhood, and the restlessness told on her.

Fine lines about the eyes and mouth told of the nerve destroying pace of a modern woman of fashion. Margaret St. John seemed possessed with a spirit of unrest and had forgotten how to relax.

This year she seemed too listless to plan her usual spring trip and was staying in town. But she must be amused. She turned from the desk, where a bundle of old letters had given a melancholy drift to her thoughts, and took up one of the club calendars.

Ah, there was miniature day at the Women's club. That looked promising. "An exhibition of old miniatures" would certainly be amusing. Those obsolete things would afford more than a passing smile, and there was sure to be good music. Mrs. St. John listened not only with her ears, but with her heart, to a fine voice.

She was followed by curious glances as she entered. Her perfect gown, with the delicate bits of old lace, was worn well. The women of the club thronged about her, each with some special bit of gossip, the ambitious, pushing ones on the edge, glad of a smile or bow that held out hopes for social advancement.

As the president took her place they settled into their seats to listen to the brief program. A brilliant harp, piano and violin trio, the first number, ended with a flourish. Then, following a few sweet bars on the piano, came a voice so pure, so rich, so clear, that an utter quiet settled on the audience. "O del mio dolce ardor!" sang the girl. A critic might have found flaws in the execution; but it was a voice that sank into one's heart.

Mrs. St. John gave the singer her utmost attention. She had no program—in fact, never cared who these people were who amused her, but some note in that girl's pure voice stirred her profoundly. Once long ago a voice strangely like this had called to her heart, but she was not allowed to respond. Her parents were too worldwise to permit any wandering from prearranged plans.

But in her moments of self communion Margaret St. John always heard that voice call to her out of the silence. Now it seemed to her almost as if this secret of her heart was being proclaimed to all the world.

She looked eagerly at this girl whose voice charmed them, a slender figure in a black gauze gown, dark eyed and foreign looking. "O del mio dolce ardor!" faded into a faint minor, and Mrs. St. John, roused herself at the sound of soft clapping of gloved hands. She did not applaud.

Another number or two of instrumental music followed, then a soft hum of conversation everywhere as the teacups were handed about. Mrs. St. John moved with the rest toward the miniature exhibit. Delighted little peals of laughter told of the oddities in these old pictures of the past that the wave of fashion had left stranded.

Mrs. St. John glanced over them in her bored way. Really, except for that song, it was scarcely worth the trouble of coming, she thought. Then suddenly, face to face, her youth looked at her. It was her own picture. She looked at the card. "Lent by Miss Margaret Delafield," she read.

"Who is Margaret Delafield?" she said aloud.

"Why, our sweet singer, Mrs. St. John. Hasn't she a superb voice?" answered the president. Mrs. St. John put out her hand. "Where is she? Take me to her."

The president slipped her arm around her, for she looked as if she would faint, and turned to the door of the anteroom. "Here, dear," she said; "I will send her to you," and asked one of the ladies to see that Miss Delafield came to them at once.

When the door opened and the young girl entered the president left them. Mrs. St. John reached out her hand to this girl. "Where did you get that old miniature?" asked she. "It is so interesting. Whose picture is it?"

"Oh, the picture was father's. It was so beautiful I offered it to the ladies for the exhibit. I do not know whose it is."

"Tell me of yourself," the worldly woman said as her gaze searched the face of the girl, whom she had drawn beside her on the divan.

"Oh, I have been singing at the clubs this winter—just the smaller ones at first, you know. I was very fortunate to have the opportunity of this afternoon."

"But your childhood," eagerly asked Mrs. St. John—"your father, your mother?"

Bit by bit Mrs. St. John got the whole story. Margaret was the daughter of the lover of her youth, Elwood Delafield, who had married an Italian woman while studying abroad. Both parents were dead, Margaret told her, and the friends of her father in the American colony in Rome had advised her to come to America, where there were many opportunities to add to her slender income.

Mrs. St. John said impulsively to Margaret: "Come home with me, dear. I knew your father very well, and I must know his daughter too."

At dinner she watched the girl reflectively. Every tone in her voice was full of memories. Long they talked that evening in Mrs. St. John's luxurious room. "Stay with me, dear. I am a lonely woman. We will see about cultivating that glorious voice." And she held her in her arms and kissed her good night.

Margaret Delafield went away full of delightful dreams of a rosy future. How could people say Mrs. St. John was cold and haughty? Why, she was as sweet and tender as a mother. Far into the night Mrs. St. John mused, looking at the pictured face.

So he had kept it all those years, and the girl was called Margaret. She would keep her for her very own, and every act of kindness would be as a recompense for all she had denied herself. She should have the best masters, but there would be no more singing at the clubs. Margaret was for her.

It was a nine days' wonder, "just a sudden fancy," said some of her women friends, while others said, "Mrs. St. John looks like a woman who had an interest in life for the first time since I have known her." She had an interest indeed. It was to sit in the dim twilight and listen to Margaret sing. Then she asked always for the old songs, the songs of her girlhood when Margaret Delafield's father had called to her heart, but fate forbade her answering.

Sydney Smith's Wit.

Sydney Smith was the mint foetal wit par excellence, but unhappily his jests were so admirable that they are now twice told tales indeed. However, most of them will bear repetition.

Before the first bishop of New Zealand left England Sydney Smith strove to remind him of the dangers of his mission. "You will find in preaching to cannibals," he said, "that their attention will not be directed to the spirit, but always be concentrated on the flesh, for I am told that they never breakfast without a cold missionary on the sideboard. We shall never meet again, but let us hope that you may thoroughly disagree with the savage who eats you."

"You are afraid of me," said Smith to a young woman who sat beside him at dinner. "You crumble your bread, and that is an undeniable proof of shyness. I do it when I sit by the bishop of London and with both hands when I sit by the archbishop."

"Why are you doing that?" said he to a child who was stroking the shell of a turtle. "Oh, to please the turtle," was the answer. "Why, child, you might as well stroke the dome of St. Paul's to please the dean and chapter."—Boston Post.

Sullivan's Best Compliment.

When Sir Arthur Sullivan of Gilbert and Sullivan fame was traveling in the western states a man rushed up to him and, grasping his hand, said: "Say, by-golly, I'm mighty glad to meet you! When I heard you was a-comin' I couldn't wait hardly. But, say, you ain't very big, are you? How much do you weigh?"

"About 150 pounds," answered the astonished composer.

"Then how on earth did you come to knock out Ryan?"

"I never knocked out any Ryan. What do you mean?"

"Ain't you John L. Sullivan?"

"No, I'm Arthur Sullivan."

The man stood dazed for a few minutes, and then a smile spread over his rough features. "Are you the feller what put 'Pinafore' together? Well, then, I'm mighty glad to meet you just the same."

Sir Arthur counted this as one of his greatest compliments.—Chicago Record-Herald.

THE INVALID'S HAIR.

How a Woman Sufferer May Be Spared Much Pain.

In every one's life there comes the work of having to comb or disentangle the hair of a woman who has been sick. It is not an easy task. It requires patience and a good deal of knowledge. Those who have never done the work may be glad to stow away in their memory these facts: That knots in hair should always be disentangled from below, not above.

In smoothing and combing a sick person's hair the first work is to part it from forehead to nape of neck and brush the two divisions well away from each other.

The hair should be separated by the comb into small divisions, one at a time, beginning at the forehead. The combing should begin at the end of hair, never at the scalp. The hair near the head should be securely held by the hand and twisted over one finger so that the scalp will not feel any pull from the comb.

Begin work about an inch from the end and gradually work up. When a knot is struck it should be separated, if possible, from the smooth hair and loosened by the teeth of the comb at its lower edge.

The comb should not be jerked above it, as this will make it more obdurate and snarl the other hair. If a knot is loosened by the teeth of the comb inserted into the outer edges and shaken gently, the hairs unroll and spring back into the rightful position.

A little skill and a little patience will teach a person how to disentangle any snarls with speed and ease.

When each division of the hair has been gently combed out and separated from those that are uncombed, all the hair should be drawn back over the shoulders and the comb gently run through it from forehead to ends.

If the patient remains in bed the hair should be again parted down center and softly braided into two plaits which have the ends turned under and securely tied with baby ribbon. Be sure not to make these plaits too tight. They should not start at the roots of the hair, for this causes a constant pull on the scalp, which results in soreness or headache.

How to Tell Good Wine.

The connoisseur tells good wine from bad by taste alone, but most men are not connoisseurs, and to most the following easier methods, guaranteed by an expert, prove useful:

The artificial coloring test: Soak a wooden thread in the wine and, removing it, drop on it a little vinegar. If the vinegar turns it bluish the coloring is natural, but if it turns it pink a chemical coloring matter has been used.

If the wine has been fortified with alcohol the addition of cream of tartar in the proportion of one gram to the quart will cause a granular precipitate to settle in the bottom.

If it contains sulphate of potash—a chemical that helps to hide the bad taste of a wine that has turned—a few drops of oxalate of ammonia will quickly produce a deposit.

How to Make Cocoanut Candy.

Buy one large cocoanut and in breaking it open save every bit of its milk. Pour a pound and a half of granulated sugar into a pan with the milk of the nut and heat slowly together until the sugar is melted and then let it simmer for about five minutes. Grate the fresh cocoanut and add it slowly. Boil for ten minutes after the cocoanut is all in and stir constantly to keep it from sticking to the bottom of the pot and burning. Pour out on buttered china plates and cut into squares. This should then be set into a cool place and left for forty-eight hours, as it takes about that time to harden.

How to Secure Flaky Pie Crust.

One housekeeper noted for her flaky pie crust, which is never heavy nor soggy at the bottom, attributes her unvarying success to the fact that she never puts a pie hot on a table when removed from the oven. She takes it from the pan and rests it upon a wire screen, elevated so that air gets at the pie from all sides. The pies cool so quickly that there is little or no danger of their becoming steamed or soggy. Never put a pie away until it is perfectly cold and then do not place in the refrigerator or its flakiness will be ruined.

How to Prevent Ingrowing Nails.

Boys who "simply grow" suffer torture with ingrown toe nails. The natural instinct of the boy is to cut the toe nails, as he does his finger nails, in a semicircle at the top. Teach him to reverse the cutting, making a dip or "v" toward the center of the nail, and not cutting down at the corners. It is well also to file the nail a little in the center at the top and always to keep the skin pressed back around the root of the nail. A festered, ingrown nail is just one step from blood poisoning.

How to Corn Beef Tongue.

To corn a beef's tongue wash it and wipe dry. Make a pickle of a gallon and a half of water, half a pound of brown sugar, two and a quarter ounces of salt and half an ounce of saltpeter. Boil for half an hour, skim and when cold pour over the tongue. Keep in a crock for a week in a cool place before using.

How to Renew a Black Skirt.

Begin by brushing it, then sprinkle with strong coffee with which a little ammonia has been intermixed. Remove any spots with a sponge dipped in ammonia. Grease spots are best removed with salt dissolved in spirits of wine. Place a woolen cloth over the skirt and iron it. The woolen cloth must be damp.

BURGLARS BUSY

THERE are hundreds of robberies every day of the year about which we hear nothing, but through which people who are careless about money, lose it.

That person who keeps his or her money in a bank, has but little fear from the hold-up man or the house-breaker. It is the man who carries money on his person that usually gets "touched."

Your money, if deposited with this Bank, will be absolutely secure.

A missionary who labored in a tropical island desired to wean his flock to his own ideas of clothing. He appealed to their vanity and gave to the fairest of her tribe several yards of cloth wherewith to make a skirt. She was to appear in the garment at the next mission meeting. She did so. But the missionary's pleased expectancy was turned to consternation when the untutored savage appeared with the whole of her gift wound upon her head in the form of a towering turban.—Charity Organization Review.

THE attempt of the liquor dealers to set aside the will of the people in this, and other counties, of the state will prove a boomerang. In this county, the whole object of the election commissioners was to seperate the questions and to make the instructions so plain, that by no possible chance, could an elector cast his vote by mistake and any fair minded man cannot deny that the use of seperate ballots and instructions was a move for the casting of an intelligent vote, and whether the supreme court reverses Judge Mayne's decision or not, will give the commissioners credit for a desire to have a decisive verdict rendered.

valuable days of the year to the schools and pupils.

Rural school conditions are not what they should be or what they would be if we could in some manner awaken the people to their importance. School houses and grounds are for some reason neglected and the children are forced to spent the greater part of their childhood days in places that are cheerless and uninviting.

It is certainly true that the present tendencies of the brightest of the rural people is towards the cities and when one will compare the often dingy cheerless school house and grounds of the country with the bright and cheerful well equipped city schools, this tendency toward the city is not surprising.

In many communities where the homes are large and commodious the school house will be small and uninviting. In this place the boy or girl is obliged to spend a great deal of time and it is not surprising that they long to get away from such conditions.

Let us get together on April 30 and talk over ways and means whereby the school house and grounds may be made one of the most inviting places in the whole community. The teachers will be urged to take this matter up and prepare programs for the day.

Parents are urged to take a hand in the matter and help the teachers.

The teacher alone cannot do much in this line but with the help of the patrons the day may be made a very valuable one and through it we may be able to secure such surroundings for our country children as will lead them away from their longing for the glare of city life.

Help your boy or girl to plant a tree on April 30. Look your school house over and see if you cannot suggest a plan that will make it a more inviting place for your children to spend their time.

Respectfully,

J. H. MILFORD,
Commissioner

Farm and Garden

HOUSE FOR GRAIN.

Rat and Mouse Proof For Storage Purposes.

A well built and handily arranged granary is without doubt one of the most necessary buildings on the farm. The grain house shown in the illustrations herewith has many advantages. It is rat and mouse proof and has ample storage room for farm implements. The grain may be loaded from the bins to the wagon without any labor, and the interior arrangement is such that it is not possible for grain to heat and mold or become sour.

The building may, of course, be built any size. The six posts that carry the structure in the drawing, which provides for a building 20 by 36 feet square, are 8 by 8 inches square and twenty feet long, set on a good solid foundation of stone or cement, with an iron pin in each post. The end sills and also the center girder are 8 by 10 inches square. The spaces between the bents are filled in with 2 by 10 inch floor timbers set twelve inches on centers. The floors should be six inch matched lumber and well seasoned.

The building is framed and braced by 2 by 6 studding set twenty-four inches on centers around the entire building.

The open space below is seven feet in the clear and may be inclosed on two sides, as shown, or the front may be filled in with doors and the remaining three sides boarded up tight, or if desired all four sides may be left open.

The first floor is reached by a swinging ladder or step that may be hooked to the floor timbers when not in use. A permanent stair should be built from the first to the second floor and located in one end.

The outer walls are covered with matched lumber and this in turn covered with drop siding or boarded up and down and battened. The inner walls are left bare to avoid having any hiding places for rats or mice, and if one should chance to get in a dog or cat could easily catch it.

The bins are made seven feet high at the rear, six at the front and six or seven feet wide.

The floor is sloping, as shown, and the bins should set some distance from the wall. The peculiarity of these bins is in the ventilation. Two three inch galvanized iron pipes are placed as shown, one at the bottom and one about the center. The pipes have one-half inch holes punched every eight inches on the top and bottom and the holes covered with screen wire. This may be soldered on or wrapped with wire. Four one inch holes are bored in the floor of the bin and also covered with screen wire. The open ends of the pipe and the holes in the floor allow a free play of fresh air through the grain at all times and also allow the moist, heated air to escape. No grain will mold in one of these bins. Not even buckwheat, the worst grain we have to heat, will be damaged.

FARMER A BUSINESS MAN.

Prosperity of the Country Depends Upon System.

To be up to date the farmer must plan ahead. If he is wise he will open accounts in his ledger for every crop he raises, including horses, cows, sheep, swine and poultry. He will have a system of bookkeeping that will show him at the end of the year which crop paid a profit and which created a loss.

It will be a great satisfaction to know how the potato, the onion, the general garden, the hay and the straw crops paid. His ledger will show how many days his teams worked, crediting them with such amounts as he would have had to pay had he hired teams to do the work. Against this will be the price of feed. There need be no item for labor in attending to the horses, as the manure and the use of the animals for pleasure drives will offset that.

The income from the cows and the sheep, the swine and the poultry would have their place, against which would have to be the cost of feed.

The writer knows of a progressive farmer who follows that system year after year. His daughter keeps the books. He reports each night the sales, the purchases, the hours the teams were at work, etc., and thus is be able to keep a record of his doings and knows exactly what each crop means to him.

Beginning the new year, the farmer should lay out his plans for the spring operations, the size of the vegetable garden, the varieties to grow, the increase of the small fruit plots and the additional trees to the orchard, the changes and the repairs that should be made to the barn and other buildings, not forgetting improvements on the old homestead.

There are a hundred and one matters that can be planned for 1909's operations, and no better use could be made of one's evenings than to map out all these matters.

The latest catalogues of reliable seeds, nursery and implement houses can be secured, and profitable time may be spent in carefully looking them over. Lists of seeds, trees, tools, etc., should be got out and ordered before the general rush in spring. This will avoid delays, errors and vexations generally.

The farmer is a business man, and each year the farm is becoming more important to the welfare of the country. The farmer is no longer the subject of ridiculous cartoons, but the emblem of prosperity in all the high class publications. The whole world looks to the sturdy tiller of the soil for the means of maintaining prosperity in the land.

Bisulphide of Carbon Effective.

The barn, the cornerib, the wheat bin and even the farmhouse itself can be divested of all noxious and destructive insects and vermin by the use of bisulphide of carbon, says the United States department of agriculture. It is a liquid which forms a powerful and volatile gas very penetrating. If liberated in any tight place it will search every crack and kill every bug and for that matter everything else. The usual proportion given is one pound to 800 to 1,000 cubic feet. Some authorities recommend a pound of bisulphide of carbon for each hundred bushels. No injury is done the grain by its use, nor is there any danger from feeding the grain afterward, as the bisulphide of carbon entirely disperses. Since the stuff is very explosive, its use in connection with lighted pipes or cigars should be prevavoided.

A New Sulphur Wash.

During the past season the department of agriculture has made an important discovery that the self boiled lime sulphur wash is not injurious to peach foliage when properly made and will not produce russeting and other injurious effects on apples. Furthermore, it has been found to be about as effective as a fungicide as the standard bordeaux mixture. Extensive experiments have been carried on during the year by the department on nearly all of the common fruit diseases which are preventable by spraying, and it has been demonstrated that the above mixture is a very useful one.

A Self Closing Hinge.

A hinge such as is shown in the illustration may be made by the amateur blacksmith, and it is not only inexpensive, but is self closing and will not get out of order or readily break. It is made by twisting two small rods of the required size twice around, as shown in the cut. For small gates one-quarter inch or three-quarter inch or three-eighths inch rods are about right, but for large gates or doors larger rods should be used. The rods are heated red hot, placed in an iron vise and given two twists, as shown. The four ends are hammered out flat and the holes drilled and countersunk for the screws, bolts or nails. As will be seen, the hinge acts like a screw and will always close the door or gate by the weight of same. If you have no forge, fine rods in the scrap pile and most any smith will make a pair of hinges for less than the price of a pair of strap hinges, and they will last much longer and, as above stated, are self closing.

How to Keep Windows From Rattling.

There is many a family that has been annoyed by the loose windows when the wind rattles them. Wooden pegs inserted into the side of the sash will keep the windows from rattling. These convenient little pegs can be made by splitting a clothespin in half. A cord can be fastened to the side of the window and the head of the clothespin tied to this. It will always be in place, ready for immediate use. If each loose window is provided with one of these handy little things, there need be no more annoyance from the noise.

How to Restore Color to Ivory.

The woman who is worried by having her small ivory ornaments yellow prematurely should dip them in benzine, let them stay for about ten minutes and then rub into the crevices with a small toothbrush. Benzine is also good to clean the keys of a piano, but denatured alcohol is quite as satisfactory and much cheaper, besides not having a disagreeable odor. Make the rag just damp enough to remove the soil. When too wet it runs into the cracks and injures the wires.

How to Clean Soiled Photographs.

The owner of fine photographs that are unframed is often distressed to see them the worse for wear from greasy fingers. The next time you are so annoyed try covering the spots with fine talcum powder. Apply the powder with a soft white rag, rub lightly, then blow off. The picture will be clean, and no harm can possibly be done to the paper.

TOPICS ON THE SIDE.

The largest melon ever grown, so far as can be ascertained, was raised last summer by Sikes Young on his irrigated farm near North Yakima, Wash. It was four feet long, three feet through and weighed 196 pounds.

Statistics show that tuberculosis in animals is on the increase. A recent estimate, based on the meat inspection and the records of the tuberculin test, shows: Beef cattle affected, 1 per cent; hogs, 2 per cent; dairy cattle, 10 per cent. The financial loss to stockmen and dairymen because of this disease is estimated to be fully $14,000,000 per annum.

About the most dangerous thing used about the barn is a cheap lantern, and the user is not always considered a brave man either.

The new elevators for unloading car corn from the wagon are no doubt many leaps ahead of the scoop shovel, but where the latter method is used all the boxes should be supplied with shoveling boards instead of ordinary end gates.

The exports of agricultural products in the fiscal year 1908 were valued at $1,017,000,000, an amount greater than for any year except 1907, the reduction of $37,000,000 under that year being chiefly due to the falling off in value of cotton exports. The exported cotton was valued at $438,000,000, the grain and grain products at $215,000,000 and the packing house products at $136,000,000.

Garden and orchard work can go right on in the winter as well as in the summer. There are many little things which can be done in the cold months. Repairing fences and pruning are never out of season.

Buckwheat contains about as much digestible constituents as corn, but not so much fat or carbohydrates.

A Texas stock raiser says cottonseed meal is not only not unsafe and detrimental to pigs, as a great many farmers believe, but is the most appetizing, nutritious and healthful of all feeds common to this country.

Prolific Fields.

Perhaps the hardest point for the unprofessional man to understand is that two fields of soil may look alike, but one will yield seventy-five bushels of corn and the other nineteen. This very example may be seen at the Urbana (O.) experiment farm, where one field has been grown to corn exclusively for thirty years without manure or fertilizer of any kind. Last year it gave up less than nineteen bushels to the acre. Not ten rods away, with everything else the same, over seventy-five bushels to the acre were harvested, only because the necessary plant food had been replaced in the form of stable manure, etc., and because rotation had been practiced, using clover as one of the crops in the rotation scheme.

Starting a Balky Horse.

There is most always one horse in every lot that refuses to budge when time is called. A horseman who has had experience says: "We have seen a bad case conquered by the driver getting out of the wagon and patting the animal on the head for a minute. Then he picked up a stone, lifted up one of the animal's front feet from the ground and gave each nail a light tap and a smart tap on the frog. Then he dropped the foot quickly, jumped into the wagon and told the horse to go, and he did."

The two mast schoonar Isoldo Bock of Manitowoc, the first schooner of the season, arrived in port Sunday with a cargo of baled hay for the White Lumber Co. of Boyne City.

Sunday, April 18, all churches will go on their summer schedule for holding evening services. Heretofore evening services began at 7:00, but hereafter the opening hour will be 7:30.

Wm. Scroggie returned Tuesday evening from a short visit with his brother, who is a student at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. He also made a short visit to Detroit on his return.

Charles Lamphear returned last week from Flint, where he has worked during the winter in the Buick Motor Works. Charlie will be with W. F. Johnson, the ice cream man, for the summer.

Miss Emma Kuntz expects to leave Thursday morning for Graad Haven, where she will spend the summer with her sister. She will visit in Traverse City, Elk Rapids and Grand Rapids while enroute.

There will be special meetings at the Salvation Army all week, April 19 to 25 inclusive. The Jones sisters, who are famous singers and musicians, will be the leaders, and on Friday, April 23, Major McPherson, of Detroit, the Y. P. S., will be the speaker. Don't miss these meetings. Come early to get seats. Door will be open at 7 o'clock. These meetings will be free until otherwise announced.

A band of boys and girls whose ages range from ten to fourteen years, were formed into "talent workers" at the Baptist Sunday school Easter Sunday. Each were given 25 cents by the pastor and commanded to trade with the same, making it gain as much as possible till the first Sunday in July, when each is to report, the one who has gained the most is to be presented with a handsome bible. Good plan.

Despite the rain Monday evening, a crowd of friends to the number of twenty, gathered at the Korth home on south State street, the event being a double birthday surprise party in honor of Miss Emma Kuntz and R. C. Korth. Progressive pedro was the chief amusement of the evening, the winners of the prizes being Miss Sadie Helverson and Oba Trombley. The consolation prizes were awarded to Miss Carrie Bartlett and Charles Withers. Delightful refreshments were served.

J. G. Holliday has commenced clearing the ground on the lot east of the Munroe block and will at once commence the erection of an electric theatre building 53x70 feet in size. The structure will be substantially built of cement blocks on a concrete foundation, and beside an ideal theatre room with a twenty foot ceiling, the plan also contemplates a store room with living rooms overhead. The new building will front on Esterley street—East Jordan Enterprise.

A contract has been closed with Mr. John S. Baker for a new P. B. X. hotel system for the Hotel Bartlett at Charlevoix, which he has just purchased and renamed the Baker's Inn. The contract calls for twenty-five stations, and the same has been installed by the division force. This will be the first hotel system in the Lower Peninsula north of Traverse City, and Manager Crouter and Landlord Baker are to be congratulated on the enterprise shown by Charlevoix in this order.—Michigan State Gazette.

Spring is here. J. E. Henderson the circuit court stenographer, says so. Tuesday morning of last week, he took a dip in Lake Cadillac three times. Twice he did it for the fun of the thing and to show the people that spring really is here. Then he lost his fountain pen without which he would lose his reputation as the best court stenographer in the state. He could not stand that and he was due anyway to leave in a few minutes for the Kalkaska court, so in he jumped again. He says the water is still quite cold and very wet but that the pleasure was great.—Cadillac News.

FOUR MILLION DOLLARS

Of Primary School Money Laying Idle in Michigan.

Figuring ahead for several months, some people can see how the state treasury about August 1st will be as dry as the middle of Sahara. On the other hand they figure that with the primary school fund properly adjusted there will be no treasury deficit. It is estimated that there are four millions of school money laying idle in the school districts of the state. Many counties are receiving annually more primary school money than they can possibly use, as it can be used only for the salary of teachers. The primary fund is growing greater each year and will increase by at least $175,000 this year. On July 13, 1908, there was idle in the treasuries of school districts in 58 counties $3,036,238.95. The sums range from $2,873.50 in Ontonagon county to $200,000 in Van Buren county. The legislature may decide to take a hand in the matter before it adjourns, deciding upon a new basis of distribution.

A GREAT LECTURE

Was Given by Judge Brown Friday Evening.

On the "Boy and the Law"—One that Left Food For Thought,

Those of our citizens, who stayed at home Friday evening and failed to hear the lecture by Judge Brown missed a rare treat, a lecture that was along new lines and left all with food for thought.

Judge Brown proved that he thoroughly understood boys and the whole text of his lecture was that boys play square, that by example do they learn to practice deceit. The judge gave numerous instances which had come before him, both as a judge of his court and in his travels, to prove the truth of his position and at times carried his audience with him by bursts of eloquence. While it was a disappointment to the association that a larger audience was not present they closed the season with the knowledge that they, too, played square with the citizen's of Charlevoix.

CLASS OF THIRTY-THREE

Contest Closes in White Rose Hivr, L. O. T. M. M., No. 443.

L. O. T. M. M. contest closed Tuesday night with the initiation of a class of thirty-three. The contest has lasted two months, Mrs. Una Campbell and Mrs. Clara Todd being the opposing captains, Mrs. Todd's side winning. Mrs. Una Campbell, the defeated captain, presented Mrs. Todd with a boquet of carnations in behalf of the defeated side, with a few words of congratulations. The Hive presented their Commander, Mrs. Sweet, with a beautiful boquet. At the close a banquet was served.

The rooms were decorated with red carnations and the hive colors. The American flag held a prominent place.

This is the largest class ever taken in at once and White Rose Hive is becoming stronger every year. Number present at meeting one hundred and fifty.

BUICK BEST MACHINE

The recently organized Buick racing team headed by Lewis Strang and Bobby Burman, has been winning more than its share of victories during the past six weeks.

Following closely Burmnn's 100-mile track championship title, won in 102 minutes, on the New Orleans circular track with a stock car, Strang captured two events at Daytona Beach, each at a distance of 100 miles. In one of the races Strang covered the distance in 90 minutes with a $1750 stock Buick.

George Dewit, the Jacksonville amateur, driving his $1000 Buick, also won two-mile races at Daytona finishing with the little Buick in 99 minutes. Both DeWitt's and Strang's time is several minutes under the previous world's records for the cars.

In the Atlanta, Ga., hill climb, Strang won the event for cars selling $3000 and under with his $1750 Buick, doing the mile climb of a steep grade in 58 3-5 seconds and breaking the course record for equipped stock cars. Strang also won the $5000 and under class with the same car in 59 seconds.

Two little Buicks ran first and second in the $1000 class event.

Bobby Burman won the event for $3000 and nader touring cars with his $1750 Buick.

Burman will defend the Buick colors in the Fort George hill climb, and the other Carnival week events in New York, the last week of April, while Strang and Louis Chevrolet will take in the big Lookout mountain climb and track meet in Chattanooga, Tenn., the same week. Dr. G. W. Crouter, is local agent for the Buick.

One of the most interesting events in connection with the Michigan State Sunday School convention to be held in Saginaw, November 17-19, 1909, will be the religious census, to be made under the direction of the visitation department. The plan is to have the convention adjourn early on the second afternoon of its session, and proceed at once with the canvass of the city. Within two hours from the adjournment, it is expected that the enrollment will have been completed. As Saginaw is a city of some 55,000 people, this may appear like a large contract; but, with the assistance of some 550 local, and as many out-of-town delegates, the work can easily be accomplished. But, with even that number of workers, it will be a case of what is called on the street, 'going some.'

It is the intention of the state committee on visitation to urge forward the work in different parts of Michigan during the year, and to make the Saginaw census the grand round-up for 1909. When our Sunday-school people come to see the benefits of such a visitation, many of even the smaller towns will be anxious to see the work accomplished.

The committee on visitation elected at the Detroit convention is as follows: President, Rev. S. A. Denn, Croswell; Rev. Howard R. Chapman, Saginaw; Col. C. W. Campbell, Mt. Pleasant; B. S. Stratton, Owosso.

"The drying out of twenty Michigan counties in the local option election this week will cost Cincinnati liquor interests a large amount of business annually and it will be safe to estimate the loss of about two millions a year," said a wholesale liquor dealer in a discussion of the liquor situation.

"There are probably fifty millions of dollars invested by whiskey interests in that city. Cincinnati is the great liquor center of the country and feels the prohibition wave most keenly."

That city supplied the larger part of the liquor consumed in Michigan counties.

"There is no mill now by the name site John." At 6 o'clock last Wednesday morning the dam across the Clam river at Falmouth gave away on account of a heavy pressure of water. The grist mill on the bank, owned by D. M. Robinson & Son, was undermined and tipped into the stream, being made a hopeless wreck. The machinery is practically a complete ruin. No one was in the building at the time. The company's loss will be nearly $5,000. A high wind prevailed at the time of the break and helped along the work of the ruin.

Henry Copeland who runs a sawmill nearby, relied on the dam for water power and he will now be badly crippled in his business.

STOMACH DISTRESS

And Indigestion Misery Ends Five Minutes Later

Almost Instant Relief From Dyspepsia and Stomach Trouble is Waiting for You.

Every family here ought to keep some Diapepsin in the house, as any one of you may have an attack of indigestion or stomach trouble at any time, day or night.

This harmless preparation will digest anything you eat and overcome a sour stomach in five minutes afterwards.

If your meals don't tempt you, or what little you do eat seems to lie like a lump of lead in your stomach, or if you have heartburn, that is a sign of indigestion.

Ask your Pharmacist for a 50-cent case of Pape's Diapepsin and take one triangle after supper tonight. There will be no sour risings, no belching of undigested food mixed with acid, no stomach gas or heartburn, fullness or heavy feeling in the stomach, nausea, debilitating headaches, dizziness or intestinal griping. This will all go, and besides, there will be no sour food left over in the stomach to poison your breath with nauseous odors.

Pape's Diapepsin is a certain cure for all stomach misery, because it will take hold of your food and digest it just the same as if your stomach wasn't there.

Actual, prompt relief for all your stomach misery is at your Pharmacist waiting for you.

These large 50-cent cases contain more than sufficient to cure a case of dyspepsia or indigestion.

$100 Reward $100

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials. Address: F. J. LIMBERING STIFF JOINTS.

How This Distress May Be Relieved by Simple Remedies.

That old remedy, beloved of our grandmothers goose grease—is still considered an excellent cure for stiff joints. Probably the friction and hard rubbing have more to do with the cure than the special variety of grease, and if the goose product is not at hand hot vaseline, lard and turpentine mixed, and even hot olive oil, are excellent lubricators.

If the stiff joints come from rheumatism, internal remedies should be taken as well. Lithia water will counteract the first tendencies, but should the pains continue it is best to consult a physician.

Should stiffness arise from overexercise, before rubbing with grease take a bath as hot as one can bear it. A few handfuls of rock salt added will heighten the good effects.

After the greasing special exercise for the joints affected help in the limbering process. If the shoulders are stiff, for instance, try the circular head and shoulder movements, first to the right, later to the left. The lower part of the body can be quickly limbered by raising the hands over the head and bending over them to the floor, thus bringing into play all the waist muscles.

A stiff knee should be rubbed with a circular movement, and the lower part of the leg should be slowly moved backward and forward. Any of these exercises may seem somewhat painful at first, but will give relief if persevered in.

How to Blow a Nose Scientifically.

Medical experts are calling the attention of the public to the importance of performing the nose blowing operation in a scientific and hygienic manner. First one nostril and then the other should be blown without undue violence. Doctors state that the two nasal passages should never be closed at the same time. If they are obstructed, as in the case of a cold, the back of the throat is filled with compressed air, and this, together with the discharge and the microbes which it contains, may be driven through the eustachian tube into the middle ear and lead to serious results. A great authority on the subject used to forbid his patients to blow their noses when suffering from a cold. This course is hardly one which will commend itself to those in the habit of catching colds. The best advice would seem to be that when it is necessary to blow the nose the blowing should be done gently.

How to Make Cheese Straws.

To make cheese straws put two ounces of flour into a basin, with a good seasoning of salt and cayenne; add to these two ounces of grated Parmesan cheese. When these are mixed together rub into them lightly two ounces of butter, then mix the whole to a stiff paste with the beaten yolk of an egg and a little water if necessary. Roll out the pastry till it is an eighth of an inch thick. Then cut it into straws about an eighth of an inch wide and three or four inches long. Lay these on a baking tin (which need not be greased) and bake them in a slow oven until they are a delicate brown. These straws require very gentle handling, as they break so easily.

How to Get a Tight Ring Off.

When a ring has become too tight for the finger, as will often happen among growing children, instead of using the old method of tiling take a piece of common twine, insert one end under the ring toward the hand, the other end wind closely around the finger until over the joint, and proceed to wind with the end back of the ring, and if done correctly the tightest ring will come off easily.

How to Keep Food Hot.

Instead of placing food in the oven to keep warm, place the dish or pan containing it over a pan of water and put it on the stove. The water will keep hot, and the steam from it will keep the food as hot as if it had just been removed from the stove. This is better than putting it in the oven, for the food keeps moist and does not dry it up as the heat of the oven does.

Fixing Things For Arthur.

By HENRY BERLINGOFF.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

Arthur Lynwood looked longingly after Irma Shelby, and Dick, his small brother, glanced up shrewdly into his clean cut face.

"Mushy," he said shrewdly, "why don't you marry her?"

"You scamp!" began Arthur. Then he paused. Dick was only twelve, but more than once the busy little brain under the thatch of red hair had helped the big brother through a tight place.

"I wish I knew her, old chap," he went on in a different voice. "I'm not mushy, but—well, you know how it is yourself. I can't very well force myself on her, and when we have no women folks to call on her I don't see how we are going to make it."

"They certainly are hard folks to get next to," admitted Dick. "They've been here a month and two days now, and even gabby Mrs. Pitkin can't get in with them. I guess there isn't any chance for us, Art, just the three of us men."

Arthur smiled at the phrase "us men." But, after all, Dick was one of the three who had been very lonely in the big house since Mrs. Lynwood had answered the call of the great beyond. So, with an affectionate pat on the back and a brisk "Never mind, old fellow," Arthur watched Dick turn into the schoolyard.

"I WANT HIM TO MARRY A TOP NOTCHER LIKE YOU."

Dick swung around suddenly after Arthur and tugged at his coat sleeve. "Don't worry much! I see what I can do for you," he commanded, then turned and sped back as the last bell was ringing.

The promise cheered Arthur oddly. Dick was fertile in invention and could be trusted to bring about even this coveted acquaintance if it could possibly be done.

The Shelbys had kept very much to themselves since they had come to town. Inquiring busybodies had been told by the maid that Mrs. Shelby was too ill to receive callers as yet.

She begged to be excused for a few weeks more, and the girl—Arthur had discovered that her name was Irma—had shared her mother's seclusion.

Despite his confidence in Dick, Arthur was rather surprised that evening when Miss Shelby came running out of the house as he passed. Evidently she had been watching for him, and Arthur paused uncertainly as she reached the gate.

"You are Mr. Lynwood?" she said, with questioning inflection.

"And you are Miss Shelby?" he returned. "I am at your service."

"It's about your brother—and my brother," she began in pretty embarrassment. "It seems that your brother made an entirely unprovoked attack upon mine after school this afternoon. Poor Robert was badly treated. He is not accustomed to mixing with boys—and he knows little about fighting. I understand that your brother promised him another thrashing tomorrow."

"I shall speak to Dick this evening," promised Arthur, but just as he gave the assurance Dick came tearing out of the Lynwood house, and Arthur called him across the street.

He came promptly, for Dick was not a boy to shirk responsibilities. He regarded Irma with mild amusement as Arthur repeated her statement.

"He started it," insisted Dick stoutly. "I guess no fellow's going to hear his brother called names. Your brother said mine was a dude and a pretty boy, and Art ain't that. It's different being just good looking."

"Never mind that," ordered Arthur hastily. "That is no excuse for you to hit him."

"That wasn't all," supplemented Dick. "He called you a big stiff and said that if you had any get up and get about you you'd get married and give me another mother to keep me from being lonely, and I told him that there wasn't anybody good enough for you, and he said anybody was good enough for you, and then I slammed him a good one, and there was a fight. It wasn't much of a fight though," he added, with contempt, "it had to chase him four blocks to get in one punch."

"Do you understand that you will be thrashed if you lay hands on young Shelby again?" demanded Arthur seriously.

"I'll lick him if he talks about you," declared Dick truculently. He then proceeded to address his remarks to Miss Shelby.

"Art's just the best ever," he explained. "Ever since mother died he's done everything for me, and I ain't going to have any boy call him names and say that any girl is good enough for him to marry. When he marries I want him to marry a top notcher like you."

The girl's face went crimson at the praise and its suggestion, but she smiled into the freckled face before she turned to Arthur.

"I shall see that Robert is punished if he repeats his offense," she promised, "and I don't blame such a loyal little hero worshiper for defending his big brother. I don't blame him one bit," she added, coloring again as she let her eyes rest for an instant on the grave, handsome face. "I shall be glad to see you should you care to be neighborly, Mr. Lynwood. Mother is improving, but she wishes to be stronger before she faces the ladies of the kindly and the curious."

"I shall be glad to run in this evening if I may," was the quick response and Arthur was too eager for an answer to observe the elaborate wink with which Dick favored him.

The girl gave assent promptly, and the big and the little brother bowed. Dick hung back at the Lynwood gate.

"I got something to do," he explained reproachfully. "You were late this evening. You always come home about 5."

"A client came in at the last moment," explained Arthur. "Were you waiting to see me?"

"Only about an hour," answered Dick. "I figured she would lay for you at the gate, and I wanted to finish off the job. I'll be home in about an hour, Art."

He dashed off down the street and by a circuitous route reached the rear of the Shelby house, where the plump and somewhat cherubic Robert was playing by himself.

He started to run when Dick appeared on the scene, but the more active lad had his victim pinioned by the arms, while one unfettered hand was clapped over the squirming one's mouth.

"I ain't going to hurt you—now," promised Dick. "I just want to talk to you. You told your sister that I punched you for nothing, didn't you?"

"That's just what you did," wailed Bob Shelby.

"That ain't so," corrected Dick. "I did punch you for something, but I ain't telling you what for. I told your sister that I licked you for calling my brother names, and if you ever dare say that it ain't so I'll get you in a corner where you can't run away and—you'll know how it feels to be in a dynamite explosion. I can do it, can't I?" he added fiercely, and the shrinking lad assured his lord and master that he certainly could.

"I don't want to have to do it," explained Dick. "You're so soft that if I beat you much you'll get out of shape, and you ain't got too much shape as it is. You'll make a fierce brother-in-law, Skinny, but I suppose that I'll have to stand you," for I've been fixing things for Arthur and—well, I guess you go with the family."

So Near and Yet So Far.

"I've lived for twenty years in New York apartments," said a man who would rather pay rent than shovel snow around his own home, "and I've encountered some extraordinary wrinkles in that form of existence. But the queerest thing of all happened a few days ago."

"Rent reduced?" asked an alleged humorist.

"No. In the apartment over me has lived for four years a family which I came to know pretty well. While not on visiting terms, we met often and agreeably. The head of the house was a fine fellow, for whom I entertained a sincere liking.

"Well, sir, this man, a familiar acquaintance, living in the same house with me, died suddenly and had been buried nearly two weeks before I heard of his death, and then I learned of it quite accidentally, through a chance remark by the elevator boy.

"A neat commentary on New York life, isn't it? I wonder what they'd think of it down on the old farm?"—New York Globe.

A Canine Marvel.

A contemporary relates an extraordinary story of the strength of a dog's jaws, which, as it is given with full details, we accept in good faith. The strength of a dog's jaws and teeth were never more exemplified than in the case of a Ross-shire gamekeeper, whose collie was unfortunate enough to be caught in a steel vermin trap. The gamekeeper, gun in hand, was soon on the scene, but in the short time the dog had become quite infuriated with pain. Having nothing suitable for muzzling the animal and fearing to place his foot upon the trap spring with the dog's jaws free, the gamekeeper placed the gun barrels in the dog's mouth and held them there while easing the spring. With a vicious snap the teeth closed on the cold steel ere he regained his freedom. The barrels, which are of steel, were holed through—an almost incredible performance—and were examined shortly after.—London Graphic.

Dress the Overgrown Hoofs.

Overgrown hoofs are a great eyesore and sooner or later are likely to throw the animals off their locks and bind legs. They should be frequently dressed, kept clean and in good condition. A heavy wooden mallet, an inch and a half chisel, a blacksmith's paring knife, a rasp and a file are the necessary tools.

How to Roast Meat.

Put the roast in the pan free from seasoning and flour. When sufficiently cooked pour off every particle of grease from the pan and rub two tablespoonfuls of flour into the brown substance left in bottom of pan. Pour over this one pint of cold water, put over the fire and cook until it thickens, stirring constantly to prevent lumping. Season with salt and pepper and strain into a gravy boat. For chicken gravy a half cup of rich cream is a great addition. Gravies made thus are free from grease, which is so harmful to delicate stomachs.

How to Freeze With Chemicals.

Ice cream can be frozen in five minutes and for an expenditure of 2 or 3 cents. If the preparation desired to be frozen is placed in a tin bucket or other receptacle it can readily be congealed by putting it in a pail containing a weak dilution of sulphuric acid and water. Into this throw a handful of common salt, and the resulting cold is so great that a bottle of wine immersed in the mixture will be frozen solid in a few minutes.

Four Good Habits.

There are four good habits—punctuality, accuracy, steadiness and dispatch. Without the first of these time is wasted. Without the second, mistakes the most hurtful to our own credit and interest and that of others may be committed. Without the third, nothing can be well done, and without the fourth opportunities of great advantage are lost, which it is impossible to recall.

The Obliging Reformer.

By STELLA CADMUS.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

There was no use denying that Sydney Gerald was a dawdler. He had wealth, good looks, youth, and was a society favorite. Now and then he went hunting or yachting, but most of the time he simply dawdled. That meant his club, the races and society.

He was accounted a catch, but no one caught him. He didn't really try to dawdle, but pursued his lymphatic way simply because there seemed nothing else to do.

"See here, you good-for-nothing," said the widow of the late Hon. Charles Spofford one evening at a reception as she drew him down to a seat beside her. "I have a duty to perform."

"I wish I had," he replied.

"People are saying you have no energy, no ambition, no aim in life. You have too much money—too much time on your hands. You are throwing your years away."

"Tell me what to do," replied Sydney, yawning.

"Get married."

"Too much trouble—too many emotions."

"Take a trip around the world."

"Too much change of scenery."

"Ah, I have it!" exclaimed Mrs. Spofford after a moment's thought. "You are rich. Why not turn philanthropist? Not in the way of hospitals or asylums, but go among the poor and give a few of your dollars to alleviate distress and misfortune. You don't know the real people as I do. There is no day that I am not feeding the hungry and giving out alms. Only this afternoon I gave a one legged man half a dollar, and you ought to have heard his words of gratitude."

"Just so," replied Sydney Gerald, with a bit of a smile as he thought of the many one legged men he had tossed quarters to.

"Try it for a few weeks—for three months. It may lead to your becoming a reformer. At any rate, it will rouse you up and give you something new to think of. It is positively sinful for you to be dawdling along this way."

"Yes, I think so."

"If you should turn out to be a reformer I shall take most of the credit to myself. Three months, Mr. Gerald—try it for three months, and at the end of that time I will arrange for a little gathering to hear your report. It cannot fail to be interesting. You will have a hundred different incidents to relate. Don't you feel a new and strange ambition already?"

"Yes, I think I do. Yes, I think I will turn reformer. I may not make a success of it, but I'll make a try."

The relict of the Hon. Charles spread the news. As Sydney Gerald did not entirely drop society while fitting himself for a reformer, he was lauded and quizzed on numerous occasions by numerous people.

Only a scanty few credited him with the necessary energy to pursue the object, and the most that was predicted of his efforts was the depletion of his purse without corresponding gain. There was a great deal said about the unthankfulness and ingratitude of the world in general, but it didn't seem to affect him much.

"You know you must not look for too much gratitude," cautioned Mrs. Spofford.

"No, I shan't."

"You will feel that you have done your duty, and your conscience will reward you."

"Just so."

"Many and many a time I have given pennies and got never a word of thanks. In fact, I have got black looks as the wheels of my carriage happened to throw a little mud, but I drove on feeling that I had made the world a trifle better. That feeling must be your reward."

"Yes, I shall look for it."

When the three months had expired Sydney Gerald announced his readiness to report. A score of ladies gathered in the drawing room of the Hon. Charles' widow. There were no men among them. Charity and reform did not touch that sex.

When he was ushered in it was remarked that he seemed to have acquired energy and gained ambition, and there was great curiosity as to what he would report.

"Ladies, I beg to say," began Sydney, "that in my ignorance of how to go to work I began my investigations in the house of a wealthy lady. It came about almost by accident. I found that she was in arrears to all her servants and that tradesmen were clamoring for their bills. I relieved the distress. I gave each servant two months' back pay and paid each tradesman something on account. I have a memorandum of her name."

Here Sydney Gerald paused. Mrs. Spofford turned pale, but her nerve was with her, and she managed to force a smile.

"By accident again," resumed Sydney, "I turned a corner one evening and bumped against a young woman in tears. I was a stranger, but when she understood that I had taken up the business of reformer she told me the cause of her distress. She was a seamstress.

"She had worked a week on a gown for a well known lady and on carrying it to the house had been told that she must wait a couple of weeks for her pay. She was going home penniless, hungry and the rent unpaid. The lady in the case bought a diamond tiara next day that was mentioned in all the papers. She could have paid the bill a thousand times over, but she needed the diamonds first. I paid the seamstress."

There was an uneasy movement up and down the room, and for some reason all eyes were directed on Mrs. Somerville. She was conscious of the fact, but with a sang froid that did her credit she put up her lorgnette and stared at a picture on the wall.

"I happened in at a milliner's," said Sydney, with a smile. "Queer place for a man to be, but I happened. Can't say that I was looking for a hat, but in searching out subjects for reform you have to drop into various places. Milliner a nice little widow. All her capital in the business. Just received a letter from a wholesale house threatening suit on bills overdue. Her customers all rich, but they didn't pay cash down. Don't pay in three or six months. In fact, they didn't pay for a year or so and only when forced to. I have seen many of the hats that were bought there that way. Relieved the distress and passed on."

Every lady in the room except the Hon. Mrs. Spofford had on an expensive hat. Each lady started to look at the other, but gave it up and cast down her eyes with proper modesty. They might not all have known the milliner referred to, but they had thoughts. After a painful silence Mr. Gerald continued:

"Happened to meet the butler of a house where I frequently call. Just happened, you know. Down in the mouth; looked bilious. As a would be reformer I spoke to him and got his story. Lady of the mansion hadn't paid his wages for five months and had borrowed his savings besides. He dared to speak to her about it, and she had sent him packing. Saw the same lady buying a $600 ruby ring the other day."

Every lady in the room helplessly glanced at the hands of every other lady. A poodle dog belonging to one of them seemed to be the only thing in the room at ease.

"Happened to call on a florist," said the obliging reformer when the silence had endured to the painful point; "just happened so. One of his statements of accounts sent out to a lady had been returned with a very sharp note. The account was two years old, and because he sought to collect it the debtor informed him that she should take her patronage elsewhere. It was only one case out of a score. Sympathized with the florist and passed on. Happened across a discharged coachman, discharged for hinting that he wanted his wages. Helped him out with a five dollar bill. Happened to run across a governess in the same fix. That's all. Good evening, ladies."

For two minutes after the reformer disappeared no one spoke. Then one lady after another rose up to go and, turning to the honorable widow, worked up a smile and said:

"Isn't Sydney Gerald just too charming for anything! And how awful of people not to pay their bills!"

Balzac's Refuge.

Admirers of Balzac who visit Paris will be interested in a museum specially devoted to souvenirs of the writer. It consists of the quaint old house and garden in the Rue Raynouard, at 47, where he inhabited many years and where he wrote a number of his best works. Curiously enough, the house recalls one of the most difficult periods of his life, when, it is said, he was hunted and persecuted by debtors to an alarming extent. He selected the house, it is stated, purposely as a sort of harbor of refuge from duns. It has no direct refuge from the Rue Raynouard, and one has first to pass through the hall of another house and go down two flights of stairs to a courtyard below. The house, which is a small building and which the French would only call a "pavilion," is entered from this courtyard and has a little garden at the back. At one side of the garden there is a steep wall down the side of the hill, giving the place the appearance of a little fortress.

The Thumb.

The disparagement of the usefulness and importance of the thumb implied in the expression, "His fingers are all thumbs," seems undeserved in view of the important part the thumb formerly played in the social customs of the people and the very important part it plays in our own lives.

Lord Erskine, in his "Institutes," states that among certain of the lower ranks in Scotland the final settlement of a bargain was always signalized by the licking and joining of thumbs.

Selden, in "Titles of Honor," says that kissing the thumb was a mark of servility. The clergy, the rich and the great, were in receipt of this honor from their tradesmen.

From the remotest days of antiquity the practice of licking the thumb has been regarded as a solemn pledge or promise, existing, according to Tacitus and other authorities, among the Goths, the Iberians and the Moors, and it may also be traced through successive periods down to our own times.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

A Tipping Tip.

How to avoid tipping the waiter at a restaurant: When the bill comes, pay it exactly. A certain involuntary expression of astonishment will be visible on the waiter's face, well trained though it may be. You should then rise, saying to him, "I have made an excellent dinner; you manage the establishment much better than the preceding proprietor did." During his rapture at being mistaken for the owner of the restaurant you escape.—Argonaut.

A Substitute for the Saloon.

"Now, you kids, listen to me. The minister said we needed a sub—aub—aub, oh, yes, a substitute for the saloons. He said that was the best way to get rid of so much rum in our town. Now, we all want to get a substitute, don't we?" and John Temple turned to his listening circle of boys and girls.

"Sure we do if we know what it means," said one boy, spinning around on his toes.

"Well," said John with an important air, "a subatitute is something to take the place of something else, and I've got an idea of something to take the place of the saloons, and you kids must all help. Come close up and I'll tell you."

The little company of children gathered close to John, who softly told them his wonderful plan.

"Gee, we'll try it," shouted one boy, and another answered, "You just bet we will."

That night when the men on their way from work reached the place where John lived they were astonished to see him standing close to the street holding by her chain the patient family cow. They were still more surprised when they heard what he was calling.

"Here's a substitute for the saloon. Go into the house and get a glass of her milk. It is better than beer; teacher says so. Walk in, walk in!"

In front of each house on the street stood a child and a cow and the same words floated out again and again on the night air as the children kept calling.

By the time the last house was reached, the men were filled with curosity.

"What does it mean?" they said, and they turned and walked back, greeted, as they did so, by the same words of invitation to patronize the substitute for the saloon.

Just then the preacher came hurrying by. John called to him delightedly.

"Stop a minute, Mr. Stone, stop a minute and see our substitutes; how do you like them?"

Then a sudden memory came to John and he said bravely:

"Mr. Stone, my mother says you don't understand about this substitute business. She says it is the saloon which is really a substitute and it takes the place of our good homes. She says if you and the other good men would only say so the saloons would go and our homes be left all right."

For a second the minister hung his head. Then he said in a voice loud enough for all to hear:

"Your mother is right, my lad, and I'll be the first man to promise to vote to drive out the saloons. Who will help?"

A shout of "I," and "I," and "I," went up from many throats, and at the next election the saloons, those poor substitutes for home and love and comfort were voted out of town.

COLOR WORDS.

Red Seems to Be the Favorite With Most of the Great Writers.

Upon tabulating the words used by Shakespeare referring to colors it is revealed that out of every hundred color words thirty may be classed as red. Next follow twenty-two white, twenty black, seventeen yellow, seven green and only four blue. Thus Shakespeare's favorite color word was red, and investigation will show that this is the characteristic color of nearly all great writers. For instance, it is the color word most often employed by Tennyson.

In all great works of human interest red predominates, as it is the color of the very strongest of our passions and impulses—the color of hot blood. There is no color so warm, so full of joy and life, so overflowing with vitality.

Red is the color of glowing iron—of heat and passion. In nature red hastens the growth of trees, while at the same time it quickens all rotting and decay. Plants grown under red glass will grow four times as quickly as under white light, and grow to four times their usual height.

Red in excess has an evil effect. For example, an excess of red light makes one irritable and nervous. In excess red produces homicidal mania—the desire to kill. The effect of red upon various animals is well known, it having the power of enraging the bull, the tiger and the turkey.—London Scraps.

ONE BUSINESS REFORM.

Brought About by Frank Statements From Former Employees.

If the manager of a business institution knew all that his employees know about the details of the business many things would be different. The manager of a large mercantile house recently conceived the idea of writing a personal letter to every employee who had left the house during the last five years, inviting a frank statement of the reason for leaving. The former employees, now expecting neither censure nor favor, were very frank and explicit and, as a rule, wrote letters that could not fail to command respectful attention. One man told how hard he had worked to support his mother and how, when he asked for an increase, he was shifted back and forth between different superiors for several weeks without having his request rejected or acceded to and he grew tired and sought another position. Another told of the impositions of the department manager and of his inability to get relief from a nagging disposition which was taking the heart out of hundreds of other men in his department. Many points of obvious mismanagement were brought to light which had virtually driven away good men who had been educated to the business. The manager has been busy ever since instituting reforms based upon the information he received.—Collier's Weekly.

A Barber and Poet.

Jasmin, the Gascon poet, who was also a barber, was once visiting the mayor of a French town and had promised to give an informal recitation to the townspeople. The hour arrived, but his host did not appear. Several important personages assembled to accompany them to the hall, but the mayor remained invisible, busied with his toilet. Finally, fearing the impatience of his guests, he opened the door of his chamber to apologize and showed his face covered with lather.

"Just a moment," said he. "I am finishing my shaving."

"Oh," said Jasmin, "let me help you."

He at once doffed his coat, gave a finishing touch to the razor and shaved the mayor in a twinkling with what he called his "hand of velvet." In a few minutes he was in the hall receiving tumultuous applause for his splendid recitations.

Modest Goldsmith.

Oliver Goldsmith was an underpaid man from start to finish. Two hundred and fifty dollars for "The Vicar of Wakefield" was bad enough, yet for "The Traveler" he got but $100 and $25 for his "English Grammar." For "The Deserted Village," however, his publisher sent him $500. This he at once returned, with the message: "It is too much. It is near 5 shillings a couplet, which is more than any book owner can afford or, indeed, any modern poetry is worth." So he died with $10,000 worth of debts. "Was ever poet so trusted before?" said Dr. Johnson.

The German army dogs are so trained that when they find a dead body they set up a prolonged howling. If no one comes they take the dead man's cap or some small article and with this in their teeth go on a hunt for their trainer, whom they lead to the spot. If the man is wounded he gives his cap to the dog, and the same object is accomplished.—London Animal World.

Five Hundred Charlevoix County Patrons Will go to Traverse City in 1909

Elsewhere in this issue will be found a suggestive program for a proper observance of Arbor Day in our schools. This is a matter that the lecturers of our subordinate granges should take up with their teachers as the school houses and grange halls that are scattered throughout our land are twin sisters in our educational development. Subordinate lecturers will therefore plan to meet with the teachers in their jurisdiction and together unite in preparing a program that will properly observe this, the grandest of our holidays, inasmuch as it is not in celebration of some event of the past, but plans for the future and those who will follow us.

Wilson Grange No. 719

Wilson grange met in regular session Saturday evening, April 10, with an attendance of thirty-six members and no visitors. All officers present but L. A. S.

On business session, Candidate Mrs. E. K. Brown, of East Jordan, was initiated in the first and second degrees. Brother E. K. Brown was reinstated at last meeting.

A contribution of canned fruit is being collected for the Henlah farm of Boyne City.

Dinner bells were ringing in Wilson Monday night as our steam whistles are not in good repair.

We worked hard for local option and against difficulties as we have a very large percentage of Bohemian and German farming population, but these people begin to realize that the saloon is their worst enemy and they are glad to see it go.

After a very good program, grange was dismissed by Worthy Master Robert Shepard, to meet again April 21.

Indications are that we will be well represented at Pomona.

MICHIGAN CROP REPORT

As furnished by the Secretary of State for March.

The condition of wheat on April first in the state and southern counties was 76, in the central counties 69 and in the northern counties 83.

The average depth of snow on March 15 in the southern counties was 0.29, in the central counties 0.92 of an inch, in the northern counties 6.20 and in the state 1.79 inches.

On the 31st of March there was no snow in the southern and central counties, in the northern counties 2.85 inches, making the average in the state 0.67 of an inch.

The number of weeks protection to wheat by snow in the southern counties was 0.40, in the central counties 0.73 in the northern counties 2.78 and in the state 0.90. In answer to the question, "Has wheat during March suffered injury from any cause?" 247 correspondents in the southern counties answer "Yes" and 75 "No," in the central counties 103 answer "Yes" and 33 "No" and in the northern counties 37 answer "Yes" and 75 "No."

Seventy-eight mills, elevators and grain dealers report no wheat marketed in March. The amount of wheat in farmers hands in per cent. as estimated by crop correspondents at the present time is as follows: State, southern and central counties 11 and northern counties 8. This estimate is considerably less than given by this department.

The average condition of rye is 83 in the state and southern counties, 78 in the central counties and 88 in the northern counties.

The average condition of meadows in the southern counties is 77, in the central counties 83, in the northern counties 86 and in the state 81.

The average condition of horses in the state is 96, cattle and swine 91 and sheep 95.

A large percentage of fruit correspondents claim that the mild winter has been favorable for fruit and the prospect at the present time indicates a good yield, however, it is too early in the season to predict just what the outcome will be.

The following table shows the prospect for an average crop of the various kinds of fruit in the different sections of the state:

	State	Nor. Co.
Apples	87	84
Pears	82	83
Peaches	77	80
Plums	82	85
Cherries	86	92
Small fruit	84	87

WORTHY OF CONFIDENCE

An Offer Backed up by One of the Most Reputable Concerns in Charlevoix

We will either cure you of constipation or pay for all the medicine used during the trial. You pay us nothing if we fail. That's a mighty broad statement, and we mean every word of it. We will back it up with our own personal reputation, too. Could anything be more fair and secure for you?

The most scientific, common sense treatment is Rexall Orderlies. Their active principle is a very recent scientific discovery that is odorless, colorless and tasteless; very pronounced, gentle and pleasant in its action, and particularly agreeable in every way. This ingredient does not cause any diarrhoea, nausea, flatulence or griping. Rexall Orderlies are as pleasant to take as candy and are particularly good for children and delicate persons.

If you suffer from chronic or habitual constipation, or the associate or dependent chronic ailments, we urge you to try Rexall Orderlies at our risk. Remember, you can only get them at our store. Two sizes 25c and 15c. Ivy Drug Store, A. B. Fleischer, proprietor.

GOOD ROAD POINTERS

Suggestions to Supervisors on the Care of Highways.

SIMPLE BUT USEFUL DON'TS.

Expert Tells How to Keep a Road In Good Condition and Avoid Trouble. Don't Be Satisfied, He Says, With Anything but the Best.

Excellent advice on the care and construction of roads is contained in the following set of suggestions to road supervisors, which were compiled by Robert A. Meeker, state supervisor of roads in New Jersey:

Don't leave grass and weeds on the shoulders and in the gutters.

Don't dig the mud out of the gutters and throw it upon the road.

Don't leave dirt in piles on the road.

Don't throw grass and weeds upon the road surface.

Don't dump stone or gravel on an old road without first preparing the surface to receive it, because you thereby cause willful waste and woeful want.

Don't place new material on the road without leveling and shaping it so that the grade and cross section of the road will be unchanged.

Don't expect travel to spread and roll the new material, the half of the money spent is wasted by this method.

Don't put new material on an old hard road surface before first picking or loosening the old covering. It is good for the quarryman and gravel owner, but bad for the taxpayer and road user.

Don't try to do work without proper tools.

Don't leave your scarifier in the shed.

Don't forget to use your sprinkling wagon.

Don't let your steam roller be idle.

Don't think any old tools are good enough for road work.

Don't use dull picks, broken shovels, dull scraper blades or broken and leaky steam rollers.

Don't waste your ruby days.

Don't let water stand on your road.

Don't try to repair a road in dry weather without a liberal use of water.

A ROAD LEFT TO TAKE CARE OF ITSELF.

Don't allow culverts or pipes to become choked up.

Don't allow the outlets of underdrains to become stopped up.

Don't let water get under a road.

Don't let ruts form.

Don't let the road lose its original cross section.

Don't let the shoulders get higher than the center of the road.

Don't fail to widen your hills at every opportunity. No better place for the mud, grass and weeds taken off the road than on the sides of high embankments.

Don't use guard rails if you can get dirt to widen your road.

Don't bury a stone road under mud.

Don't crown your road so high that no one will travel on the sides.

Don't forget that the entire width of the road is intended for use.

Don't expect a road to take care of itself.

Don't fail to locate all good repair material lying on or near the road.

Don't wait until you are ready to go to work before you procure the necessary materials for repair.

Don't be ponsignally changing your road gang.

Don't let experienced men go simply to give some one a job.

Don't lose sight of the fact that road repairing is a trade and must be learned.

Don't guess at the amount of material required. Measure and know.

Don't depend on some one else to tell you what the condition of your roads is.

Don't fail to visit every road under your care at least once a week.

Don't refuse to try any new material that may be offered unless the same has been proved bad.

Don't think there is nothing more to be learned about road building.

Don't forget that nobody knows it all.

Don't think because you do not hear the comments that your work is not being praised or criticised, as the case may be.

Don't look down on your work.

Don't lose sight of the fact that good roads are one of the greatest factors in the development of any country.

Don't forget that churches and schools cannot thrive without good roads.

Don't be satisfied with anything but the best.

To prepare a horse for long drives he should have the best of hay and all the sound grain he can eat up clean at each meal. Then each day he should be driven five to eight miles or more at a moderate pace and be taken thorough care of by careful rubbing and blanketing. Use whole old oats in preference to other grain.

The Collar that is a Collar

Why ruin your horse by using an old collar or one that does not fit? The collar like cut is the collar; wide welt double face, warranted curled hair between the faces.

17 inch draft only	$4.00
Heavy lumber collar	$3.50
Heavy team collar	$3.00
Medium team collar	$2.50
Canvas face collar	$1.25
Buggy collar	$1.00 to $2.25

FARM DRIVEWAYS.

Michigan Farmer Tells How to Make Them With Gravel and Cinders.

While we are busily talking about good roads we must not forget the most needful one is that which runs from the gate to the barns and over which we travel many miles during the year. At the time I moved to Mapleside farm a few years ago the mud was hub deep for the horses and no better for the men on the footpaths, says D. C. Dean, a Michigan farmer. We moved to Mapleside farm in April, and the women folks did not get to the barns until after the middle of May. As soon as the crops were in these roads received my undivided attention until they were in a serviceable condition.

I did not draw in more dirt to soak up, but began at the bottom by plowing out and removing over a foot of the soil. I then opened a gravel bank and drew in enough to fill that taken out. Next I made arrangements for some cinders and put them over the gravel about a foot thick. This answered very well that season, but in the fall before the mud began to deepen I covered the road again, and during the winter all the road mixes were spread wherever there seemed to be a low spot. By following this scheme for four years I succeeded in making a road that never has any mud. If I find a low spot where water stands after a rain it is taken care of at once.

On the south side of the house three years ago I built a road that has not required any repairing as yet beyond drawing three loads of gravel last spring. For this road I pursued a little different method. It was old sod, so I plowed through it and turned the sod upside down three deep on either side of the road, then drew out all the dirt beneath that was loose and easy to handle.

This left me a trench about eighteen inches or two feet to fill, which I did from my gravel bank, and no cinders were put on this road, as I could not get them. This roadway is about nine inches above the lawn on either side and never gets muddy. About the house are cement platforms and walks, while the roadway on either side is so hard it can be swept at any time. I find it pays when you are at it to make a good road and takes no longer. I find a gravel bank about the best bank I can patronize when it comes to roadmaking.

ROLLING GOOD FOR ROADS.

Auto Found Serviceable In Making Street Passable After Snows.

The man who brings together the best productions in different lines and obtains results which better his own production may not be an inventor in the true sense of the word, but he certainly possesses good common sense.

In Vermont and other New England states a road roller is used in the winter to pack down the snow and make the roads passable. By doing this after each snowstorm a really fine winter road results. The method used in upper New York is to draw two large iron kettles, such as are used for the making of soft soap, behind a team of horses or oxen. This is not very perfect, as it leaves a core in the road and simply pushes the snow to the side of the road instead of packing it down.

After a recent snowstorm in Reading, Pa., in which the roads were left in bad condition, H. L. Hardy, the designer at a factory, conceived the idea of rolling the roads. He attached an ordinary land roller to the front of a sextuplet and started from the factory to the home of Mr. Sternbergh. Naturally he did not try to break any speed records, but the trip, about six miles, was made in one hour.

One of the road commissioners of Berks county accompanied Hardy and was much surprised to see what an improvement this roller process was over the kettle drag. Mr. Hardy says he will not patent or copyright this idea, so any one who desires to roll snow roads by automobile is free to do it.

A FARMER FOR EVERY FORTY

Slogan of West Michigan Development Bureau

AIMS TO DEVELOP THIS SECTION

Charlevoix County Should Join With Sister Counties

Antrim County is in Line—Meeting Will be Held at Muskegon, Friday, April 23.

Last week's Central Lake Torch gives the details of the recently organized West Michigan Development Bureau of which Antrim county has become a part. In conversation with prominent citizens of Bellaire recently the advantage of Charlevoix county uniting with other counties in the plan was brought up and we present the matter to our readers for Charlevoix needs a farmer to every forty acres of productive soil.

Tuesday, of last week, at Bellaire, representatives of the various local improvement organizations of Antrim county met to arrange for a ceulral association through which the townships and villages of our county may affiliate and co-operate with the West Michigan Development Bureau, recently organized by Traverse City, Manistee, Ludington and Muskegon, and in which Cadillac and Wexford county will no doubt join; the whole to co-operate with the railroads and transportation lines operating in this territory for the colonization of vacant lands and the securing of industries.

The county organization was in part perfected by the election of officers as follows:

President—E. A. Fox, Central Lake.

Secretary F. R. Williams, Elk Rapids.

Treasurer Richards, Bellaire.

A committee on further organization was selected to report at a meeting to be held in Bellaire, April 23, at which time the organization will be completed.

With a view to securing positive representation in the association for each township in the county the supervisor were made ex-officio members and vice presidents of the organizations.

The board of supervisors in session at the county capital, by a unanimous vote appropriated $200 as a nucleus of a fund to be used in this development project.

E. A. Fox, of Central Lake, and M. B. Lang, of Elk Rapids, were chosen as delegates to attend the next meeting of the West Michigan Development Bureau to be held at Muskegon on Friday, April 23.

The following is the slogan, title, objects and officers of the new West Miching Promotion Dynamo:

A FARMER FOR EVERY FORTY.

Western Michigan Development Bureau.—An organization for the advancement of the mutual interests of a great region; agricultural, horticultural, industrial, rural, municipal.

OFFICERS

RECEPTION GIVEN.

Rev. F. Dewey Ehle last Wednesday Evening at Church Parlors.

Wednesday evening the members of the Baptist Church and friends, gave a reception at the church parlors in honor of their new pastor, Rev. F. Dewey Ehle. A large crowd was present and spent the evening in getting acquainted. Rev. H. A. Putnam welcomed Mr. Ehle in behalf of the other churches, Mr. Ehle making a suitable response. Music was furnished by Harker Kirby and Dr. F. H. Wilkinson and recitations and readings filled out an informal program. Refreshments of wafers and ice cream were served and all wished Mr. Ehle all success in his work.

FORTY THOUSAND DOLLARS

Loss in Fire at Pellston Thursday Morning

CBused by Defective Chimney—Losers Were Well Insured.

One of the most disastrous fires in the history of Pellston started from a defective chimney in the Tindle & Jackson store building Thursday morning and before being checked a loss of forty thousand dollars was the result.

One handicap encountered in fighting the fire came from the fact that the gasoline fire engine positively refused to work for a time and but for the fact that a gentleman, a member of the Boyne City fire department who understood that type of machine was on the ground, it would have been practically of no service. This engine, with an extra supply of hose attached to the Pellston Planing mill plugs, rendered great service in checking the flames and thus the remaining buildings in the block were saved. To the fact that scarcely a breath of air was stirring, Pellston can attribute a lesser loss than might otherwise have resulted.

Most of the burned out people have already arranged to resume at once. Losses and insurance are as follows:

Tindle & Jackson, general store. Loss on buildings, $3500; on stock, $15,000. The insurance is distributed among several agencies and the policies are at the Buttalo office, so it is impossible to give the amount but the local managers say that an adequate amount was carried.

Meyer & Co., hardware, implements and furniture, 50x60 two story building. Loss on buildings $4,000, on stock and fixtures $10,000.

Besides the stock, Mr. Meyers lost a large quantity of his household goods and wearing apparel, and C. R. Duggan, who roomed in the building with him, lost considerable wearing apparel, etc.

Insurance as follows: With the A. H. Buttars agency $4500; Quinlan agency $2500; Kenting agency $1,000; total $9,100.

Herren & Petrie, general stock. As Mr. Herren is away it is impossible to learn the exact amount of loss, but it will not go far from $1,000, with $2,000 insurance of which $1,500 was with the A. H. Buttars agency and $500 with J. N. Wallace. Household goods and wearing apparel included in the loss. Mrs. Fish, saleslady for Herren & Petrie, who lived with the family, also lost her clothing and personal belongings.

John Wachtel, building occupied by the Herren & Petrie. Loss estimated at $2,500.

F. L. Keiser, meat market. Loss by damage to building about $200; on stock $25.

The stock and fixtures of John Beadle were more or less damaged in removing them to a place of safety.

The telephone and electric light companies also are losers in the way of burned poles, wiring, phones, etc.

New Street Commissioner.

Captain Berdan having declined the appointment of street commissioner, Thomas Shawley has been appointed and commenced his labors. Mr. Shawley has had several years experience in railroad and highway building and no doubt will make an able and competent official.

The Captain of the Kansas

BY LOUIS TRACY

Author of "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," "The King of Diamonds," Etc.

ILLUSTRATED BY BERNEKER

A terrific tropical storm, a dynamite explosion in the ship's coal disabling her engines, mutiny in the crew and cannibals without conspire against the brave and gallant captain of the Kansas. The presence among the passengers of a charming young woman, heroic as the captain himself, throws the glamour of a love romance over the perils of the deep. Told in the author's captivating style it makes a tale of the sea irresistible in its charm.

WILL HOLD BANQUET

Antrim County Republican Club Friday, April 23

Judge Mayne Will Act as Toastmaster Many Prominent Speakers.

Invitations to the members of the Antrim county republican club have been sent out for the annual meeting and banquet to be held in the Bellaire opera house, Friday evening, April 23, 1909.

All republicans are cordially invited to join the club. Fifty cents pays the membership fee for one year, and one dollar entitles to a seat at the banquet. Arrangements are complete for the banquet, and a notable list of speakers will be present, namely: Hon. Clayton L. Bailey, president of the club; Hon. Frederick W. Mayne, judge of the 13th judicial circuit, Charlevoix; Hon. C. A. (Pres) Palmer, ex-president of the state league of republican clubs, Manistee; Rev. J. J. Hustol, pastor of the Wallin Congregational church, Grand Rapids; Hon. Ernest C. Smith, prosecuting attorney, Kalkaska; Andrew B. Dougherty, Elk Rapids; Clark E. Densmore, prosecuting attorney, Bellaire; Thomas D. Meggison, Central Lake. The musical part of the program has not been overlooked, the Elk Rapids male quartette will sing. This quartette is much sought after, and no doubt is one of the best in northern Michigan. Also Prof. McCormick of the Mancelona schools has kindly consented to be present with his orchestra. Membership and banquet tickets can be procured of H. S. Amerson, treasurer of the club, or by writing James Deevy, secretary, at Bellaire.

This club, organized one year ago with a membership of seventy-five, is considered by the members to be worth all it costs as a social gathering, exchanging ideas, renewing acquaintance, etc. The objects, as appear in the by-laws, are to promote the best interests of republicanism, and to encourage attendance at the primaries, that honest and capable men may be nominated and to further their election, and the cause of good government.

WILL ENTER BUSINESS

CHARLEVOIX COUNTY POMONA GRANGE

Held Interesting Meeting With South Arm Grange

HON. A. E. PALMER OF KALKASKA

Gave Address on His Trip Throughout the Southern States

Next Meeting Will be Held With Marion Center Grange June 3 Work is Being Actively Pushed in all Lines.

Charlevoix Pomona grange met with South Arm grange Thursday, the hall being well filled at all sessions. The meeting was called to order by Worthy Master Ward before noon, an immediate recess being taken until after dinner.

On coming to order the Master appointed the usual committees, adding one on county fair.

The regular program work was then taken up. Worthy Master St. John, of South Arm grange, bade the visitors welcome, which was responded to by Worthy Lecturer Duffois on behalf of Pomona. Worthy Master Ward explained the plans of Pomona to take five hundred of the patrons of Charlevoix county to Traverse City next December, explaining how it would be not only of immense advantage to every patron as a member of the order, but to every resident of northern Michigan, as a means of bringing to the attention of the farmers of southern Michigan the vast possibilities of agricultural development, which was offered by northern Michigan. Brother A. E. Palmer, of Kalkaska, said that the patrons of Kalkaska county would be in line with the movement to exploit the resources of our territory and would be on hand proportionally strong. The matter was well discussed, South Arm promising to furnish her quota.

Brother A. E. Palmer, of Kalkaska, who is always a favorite with a Michigan audience, and who had the principal number on the program, then gave the feature of the of the day in an address on "A Comparison of the Agricultural Conditions of the South with those of Michigan." Brother Palmer has just returned from an extended trip throughout the south and, being a shrewd observer, as evidenced by his success in all his lines of activities, as well as a finished public speaker, the audience was given a treat seldom equalled on a pomona program, taking his hearers right into the homes and conditions of the southern farmer where the grange is as yet unknown.

The committee on good of the order recommended the reading of more papers devoted to farming and grange work and the saving of selections found therein for bringing before the grange; the securing of pictures for the decorations of the hall; more strict attention to the work and laws of the order and the planning of every patron to make the trip to Traverse City.

On county fair the committee made some recommendations to the committee on premium lists also on the inner arrangements of the grounds. A recommendation that the name of the grange not be displayed on grange exhibits until after being judged was, after some discussion, stricken out.

It was decided to hold the next meeting with Marion Center grange June 3, when the fifth degree will be given in full form by a picked team from Marion Center. After supper—the—third—degree—was exemplified by South Arm grange degree team, H. L. Olney, captain, who demonstrated the grand possibilities for degree work in a subordinate grange and the fifth degree was conferred on a class of eight.

During the entire meeting music, recitations, etc., was furnished by the members of South Arm grange under the direction of Worthy Lecturer Burbank and in that as well as in the leading of the patrons they proved themselves equal to any occasion.

The Athletic Association, Charlevoix high school, will give their first annual dance at the Bank hall Friday evening, April 23, after the chicken pie supper. They have issued from the COURIER Press a unique invitation in the form of a folder invitation and dance program. It will be the event of the season, and all receiving invitations should not fail to attend.

IN FIVE MINUTES

All Your Indigestion and Stomach Misery Will End

Eat Your Favorite Foods Without Fear of Dyspepsia or an Upset Stomach Resulting.

Take your sour stomach—or maybe you call it indigestion, dyspepsia, gastritis or catarrh of stomach; it doesn't matter—take your stomach trouble right with you to your Pharmacist and ask him to open a 50-cent case of Pape's Diapepsin and let you eat one 22-grain triangule and see if within five minutes there is left any trace of your stomach misery.

The correct name for your trouble is food fermentation—food souring; the digestive organs become weak, there is lack of gastric juice; your food is only half digested, and you become affected with loss of appetite, pressure and fullness after eating, vomiting, nausea, heartburn, griping in bowels, tenderness in the pit of stomach, bad taste in mouth, constipation, pain in limbs, sleeplessness, belching of gas, biliousness, sick headache, nervousness, dizziness and many other similar symptoms.

If your appetite is fickle, and nothing tempts you, or you belch gas or if you feel bloated after eating, or your food lies like a lump of lead on your stomach, you can make up your mind that at the bottom of all this there is but one cause—fermentation of undigested food.

Prove to yourself, after your next meal, that your stomach is as good as any; that there is nothing really wrong. Stop this fermentation and begin eating what you want without fear of discomfort or misery.

Almost instant relief is waiting for you. It is merely a matter of how soon you take a little Diapepsin.

Origin of Language.

Language is the vehicle of thought and is not necessarily vocal. It is safe to say that the sign or gesture language preceded the oral or real language and that it was a long time before the latter form of communicating ideas became anything like universal. There are still tribes that have only the gesture language, supplemented by the merest jargon of words. Beyond a doubt the race began its career dumb, just as the babe does, and acquired its vocabulary very slowly and painfully. —New York American.

FOOT OF THE HORSE.

Disease and Deformities Prevented by Early Attention to Young Stock.

Most owners of large breeding establishments of racing stock are fully alive to the importance of supplying conditions under which the feet of their young stock shall have every chance of proper development, paddocks of sound turf or dry porous subsoil, well shaded and well watered. With careful housing in roomy, loose boxes, on comfortable dry straw beds, surroundings are provided under which nature seldom fails to supply this valuable stock with such feet as in all probability will never, unless afterward abused, give the animals or their owners any cause of trouble. I find with many small breeders the last consideration very frequently is the condition and care of the feet of their young horses, says W. H. Gilbert. Many times I have seen promising two and three year olds with ragged, split feet and growing into all shapes but the right one when the most simple early attention would have prevented disease or deformity.

Instances are easily forthcoming as to the influence of surrounding conditions upon foot development. Place two foals at birth under quite opposite conditions, each having good feet. The one on wet meadows, where its feet are seldom or never on firm ground; the other upon dry uplands. From the meadows you have soft, flat, weak feet, while upon the uplands they have grown a good shape, tough and enduable in texture.

The best stable treatment is simple cleanliness and occasional dressing with good oil. In fact, treat the horses' feet in the same way you would your best harness.

If a young horse with sound feet be taken from a dry pasture he will be fit for shoeing at once, so far as the feet are concerned, but a colt should have his first training lessons in the stables and not in the shoeing forge and when quiet to handle should be shod.

I am sure that certain kinds of bedding are a cause of unsoundness in the feet of horses. I have not yet met with anything so good as wheat straw. The damp portions of litter should be removed daily and the animal exercised on hard ground. Each morning the litter should be carefully looked over and the dry portion removed to the sides of the box and every particle picked out of the feet.

Sawdust from the fir or pine order, I believe, has a damaging effect on the hoof, but that from woods such as elm, ash or oak is a fairly good substitute for straw.

BARN VENTILATION.

Pure Air Needed by Live Stock to Make Satisfactory Gains.

Many owners of live stock do not pay enough attention to the ventilation of their stables. This is almost as important as food and care, for without pure air at all times satisfactory gains cannot be made. Animals seem to be able to endure a great deal of hard usage in the way of breathing bad air in the houses in which they spend the winter months, but because they come out alive in the spring is no proof that they would not have done better if their quarters had been thoroughly ventilated.

If the stables and pens were kept thoroughly clean there would, of course, be less bad air even with very defective ventilation, but as the sleeping quarters of a great deal of stock on farms are kept the air that gets in through the inadequate openings is not sufficient to dilute down to the point of harmlessness the escaping ammonia and other gases.

Especially in horses' stables, in which ammonia generates more rapidly when the bedding is not cleaned out daily than in the quarters of cattle and hogs, it is more necessary to provide ample means for the entrance of fresh air.

If a stable or barn is so close that some special means of ventilation is required, about the most satisfactory is having a window with a sash hinged at its bottom, so that the top may open inward to a distance of two feet, says a Wisconsin breeder.

To compel the air to come into the barn over the top of the sash V shaped boards with the apex downward should be nailed on to the inside of the house, one on each side of the sash, so that when the sash is open these sides close the opening on each side of it and the fresh air pours over the top only. In this way not so much draft can flow about in all directions.

Tad Lincoln's Comment.

Little Tad Lincoln, upon hearing of his father's assassination, was frantic with grief, but, seeing the sun rise in splendor the next morning, seemed reassured.

"Do you think my father has gone to heaven?" he asked a gentleman who had called at the White House.

"I have not a doubt of it," was the reply.

"Then," said the lad bravely, though brokenly, "I am glad he has gone there, for he never was happy after he came here. This was not a good place for him."

The Minister's Answer.

By SYLVIA MEREDITH.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

The little minister—little in stature, little in power, little in salary—sat before a table in his study diligently and laboriously searching amid the leaves of various volumes of reference and occasionally scribbling a few sentences on paper which later on should serve as notes for his sermon on the following Sunday.

The Rev. James Philander Dubois smiled fondly and proudly and gratefully while he thought. He was an unmarried churchman who felt it incumbent upon himself to become one of the two principal performers in a ceremony in which already he had become quite proficient as an agent of fate where others were concerned.

So he leaned back and gazed at the ceiling and thought of a beautiful brave young creature. He lingered mentally on her radiant face, her graceful form, and heard in his brain the sweet thrill of her voice.

He had never thought thus of any woman before. Until he first saw Marguerite Van Diemen a year ago he looked on all women with an academic eye as parishioners and studied them only to decide what branch of church work, if any, they were best fitted for.

But the year that followed his first sight of the violet eyes of Miss Marguerite, and the brown hair that shone like sunny light drowned in amber pools in a forest brook, had been a year of awakening for him.

It was not a quite complete awakening, however. He was very thoroughly awake—wide, starling, stark awake—to the knowledge that he was so deeply in love with her that to lose her would mean a dreary, sorrowful life for him, but he was not awake enough to suppose that he had any qualities or attributes to please so wonderful and clever and bright a creature.

However, though the Rev. James Philander Dubois was thus humble and devoid of any proper self esteem, and though he did not believe that she could possibly want him, he was in love, and love sneers at logic. He expected her answer to be "No," but he was doing just the same to ask the question.

So, like the courageous and determined little minister that he was, he had written to her asking for the favor of an interview on a matter very important to him. And she had replied, appointing that very evening and adding, "You should know that I have declined an invitation to the County club dance in order to give you this evening, though the dance is the last one of the season and I was really anxious to go."

Perhaps it was this letter rather than the Rev. Mr. Philander's conviction of the stereotyped nature of all sermons that made it so difficult for him to finish the construction of his discourse.

Determined though he was, the question he was to ask Miss Marguerite in a few hours was the kind that no man ever asks without perturbation, and there was the last paragraph of her letter. It showed him that she was losing an evening of great enjoyment, for, though Marguerite Van Diemen was a good parishioner, she loved dancing with an ultra worldly love.

No doubt she expected to hear some immensely important news from him. Wouldn't she be indignant and angry when she learned that he had kept her from her pleasure simply to propose to her?

The clock struck the hour, and the minister became aware with a sharp start that it was high time to keep his appointment. He arose and put on his overcoat.

At that moment the doorbell rang.

It is only because we are so used to the really dramatic things of life that we do not know and feel the dramas that each moment makes.

The ring of the doorbell was such a dramatic instant in the life of the Rev. James Philander Dubois.

Passing through an adjoining room, he opened the door and saw before him a young woman, poorly dressed in a faded gown of blue, her head topped off with a hat of uncertain texture, under which her hair hung forth in all directions. Her face was terribly wasted and sallow, and its piteous aspect was only increased by a touch of the incongruous in a suggestion of red high on the cheeks.

The reverend gentleman shrank back. He wished that he could escape what he foresaw would be a long delay, but sense of duty conquered the human instinct at once.

The young woman spoke as soon as he opened the door. "Won't you give me something to eat?" she begged. "I haven't had anything since morning."

"Poor soul!" muttered the little minister. "The housekeeper is out for the afternoon, but I shall do the best I can for you. Will you come to the kitchen while I investigate the pantry?"

As the unkempt young woman followed him into the kitchen the minister felt such deep, angry annoyance as only a man can feel when the woman he loves is waiting for him while circumstances keep him away. But the moment he realized that he, a minister, pledged to help the afflicted and the sinning, had what was almost an emotion of hatred toward this poor creature he crushed down what were wicked and shameful thoughts to him. He hastened to bring out all the food he could find and set it before her. Food taken to the door would not have come under the head of Christian charity with the Rev. Mr. Philander, though he was the head of an ultra fashionable church.

"Have you been a victim of circumstances or what is termed hard luck?" was one of the first things the minister asked after he had dished up cold victuals and a quantity of vegetables.

"Oh, it's a long story," insinuatingly replied the woman, while she devoured the stuff set before her.

"Whatever may have been the past," said the little minister, "don't forget that forgiveness is yours for the asking."

He spoke in his most persuasive accents to the poor creature. His advice was wise and sound, for with all his modesty and simplicity the minister was both clever and alive to daily needs, a fact that the woman repeatedly acknowledged with a mournful eye and lagging appetite. At times she even desisted in her siege of the eatables when the little minister said something particularly simple and kind.

Finally she broke down and told all her story—an old, old story, not at all romantic, not even interesting to any except the poor creature herself. The minister listened patiently to her long, labored, tedious recital, and if sometimes he felt as if he would go wild with impatience when he thought of Marguerite he promptly forced himself in punishment to concentrate his mind and soul even more than before on the object before him that demanded so much of his pity and his help.

Here was a soul for him to succor and save, and what was his own heart's ease to that?

It was late that evening before the little minister returned home after having found a home for his distressed protegee. He should have felt a thrill of gratitude for duty done and a sense of humble satisfaction for his success in bringing back the straying one to the right road.

He blamed himself for not feeling it. But the more he tried to feel content because he had done his duty the more his soul sank in him and the heavier did his heart seem.

The Rev. Mr. Dubois, though a most devoted minister, was none the less an intensely human man, and all the satisfaction in doing a duty could not lift him from the despondency that he was in, for he felt sure that he had lost any chance, if he possessed one, with Marguerite Van Diemen.

His belief was strengthened to conviction next day when he called at her house, wondering what he could say to gain her pardon. It was characteristic of him that it never entered his head to explain to her what had kept him away. That would have seemed like cant and self praise to the little minister.

The only excuse he could offer was "parochial business." And he realized sharply that would seem a paltry excuse, though he didn't consider anything in the line of his duty as paltry.

So he sent up his card in low spirits, and he was not surprised, though he was grieved, when the maid returned and said that her mistress begged to be excused and added a request that he write to her, saying what she could do for him.

Another man might have felt offended and haughty. The little minister was too just for that. He went home quietly and wrote a very simple little letter telling Miss Marguerite Van Diemen all that was in his heart. He begged her forgiveness for not keeping the appointment and explained it by saying: "A little matter of church business came up to keep me. I could not evade it, though I assure you that it was a great sorrow to me to be kept away."

Then in his mind he wrote "Finis" to his romance and turned sturdily to his work on the unfinished sermon.

Twenty minutes after he had dispatched the note his doorbell rang again. This time the little minister did feel that there were dramas in little things. He laid down his pen and thought.

He heard the maid open the door. He heard a soft voice ask for him. Before he could rise a gown rustled, and Marguerite Van Diemen came toward the open library door.

"I have brought you the answer to your note myself," said she. She held up her hand. "Before I tell you what it is," she continued very hurriedly, with her breath coming short and fast and her eyes shining, "let me tell you something else. Do you know what I have always abhorred the most? The preaching that does not practice? And next to that I object to the practicing that preaches too much of what it does?"

The little minister looked at her with questioning bewilderment in his dark eyes.

Marguerite Van Diemen made a few steps forward and toward him.

"I saw you last evening on the street with a young woman," she went on. "I was a little angry that you should have thought of anything except our appointment. This morning I went to carry some medicine to old Mrs. Anston and found that you had taken the young woman there to nurse her. She told me what you had said to her and what you had done for her."

"Will you forgive me for seeming to neglect you?" faltered the little minister.

"Wait," said Miss Van Diemen. "I still wanted to test you. I wanted to see what you would do. So I waited till you wrote. If you had tried to explain more than you did, why, then perhaps I would not have brought you my answer."

And as she came toward the minister with her hands held out even the modest Rev. Mr. Philander did not need anything more to tell him what the answer was.

A soap bubble is the thinnest thing in the world. The film of about 50,000,000 of them would measure only one inch.

Both the young people have been spending some time at Cliveden, the country seat in England of Mrs. William Waldorf Astor, Miss Langhorne's sister.

The announcement of the engagement of Miss Langhorne will be of social interest throughout the country. She is almost as well known in New

She spent a considerable part of her first season in New York, Mrs. Astor coming over from England to chaperon her. She possesses all the accomplishments which made famous her sisters, Mrs. T. Moncure Parkins of Richmond, Va.; Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson of New York, Mrs. Reginald Brooks of Long Island and Mrs. Astor.

Mr. Phipps, who is a young architect, is a grandson of William Butler Duncan of New York and a nephew of Alexander Butler Duncan, who married the beautiful Mrs. Kernochan and who has been a frequent visitor in Virginia. He is well known to the hunting set in New York state.

NOT A NEW IDEA.

Women's Rights Not an Entirely Modern Development.

The agitation for woman's rights is not entirely a modern development. There was similar clamor during the days of the Roman republic, and the leading men of that time were much concerned about it.

Gaston Boissier of the French academy in his interesting work on "Cicero and His Friends" thus speaks of the growth of woman's influence in Rome:

"In a country where the family was respected, as it was at Rome, women could not fail to be of much importance. It was impossible that their influence, which was already so great within the house, should not attempt to show itself outside, and the honorable place they held in private life must one day tempt them to invade public life also. The ancient Romans, so jealous of their authority, had the consciousness of this danger and neglected nothing to defend themselves against it. We know how they affected to treat women. There was no sort of unkind remarks they did not make about them. They got them attacked on the stage and mocked them even in their political speeches."

Cato probably was the most bitter enemy of the "new woman" of his time. He watched the growth of her influence in fear for the effect which it was likely to have upon the state of society and the government of the republic.

"Remember," Livy makes him say, apropos of the Lex Oppia, "all those regulations our ancestors made to subject wives to their husbands. Shackled as they are, you have trouble to manage them. What will happen if you give them their liberty, if you allow them to enjoy the same rights as yourselves? Do you think you will then be their masters? The day they become your equals they will become your superiors."

Is it the Catonian fear which leads so many men of the day to oppose equal rights for women?

CALLING CARDS.

New Styles Demand Thinner Pasteboard Than Last Year.

The size, shape and style of cards are slightly different this season.

A thin, flexible pasteboard is used, so that a number of cards may be carried at once without undue bulk.

A woman's card is almost if not quite square, while a man's is fully as long and but half the depth.

Old English lettering, either shaded or solid, Roman block type or the old fashioned script are all in favor.

A married woman never uses her Christian or given name on her card. She always uses her husband's name, and that is spelled out in full.

Since a widow's name is identified with that of her husband, she retains that same card after her widowhood.

The fashion for divorcees is to prefix their married name by that to which they were born, as, Mrs. Jones Robinson or Mrs. Mary Jones Robinson. It being understood that Jones is her maiden name.

On the lower right hand corner of a woman's card goes the address, and now it is fashionable to have the residence number spelled out in full, even if two lines have to be used.

In the opposite corner is engraved the receiving day, no hours being mentioned, as it is understood that formal visits are received in the afternoon.

A man's card carries his name in full, prefixed by Mr., but it is not considered correct for a man to have professional degrees indicated on his calling cards used for social life only.

Where a girl has not yet been presented in society her card reads with her full name, but without the prefix Miss.

How to Avoid Dangers in Kitchen.

Be careful of dripping and fat when cooking. If you put dripping in the oven, keep a sharp watch on it or it will blaze up when the oven door is opened. Never throw water on boiling fat; it only makes it boil over worse than ever. Some salt or earth is the best thing to put it out. Don't try melting beeswax and turpentine in the oven, the turpentine catches blight with surprising ease. Melt the beeswax in boiling water first and add it to the turpentine.

BURGLARS BUSY

THERE are hundreds of robberies every day of the year about which we hear nothing, but through which people who are careless about money, lose it.

That person who keeps his or her money in a bank, has but little fear from the hold-up man or the house-breaker. It is the man who carries money on his person that usually gets "touched."

Your money, if deposited with this bank, will be absolutely secure.

Compensation for Property.

Liquor men claim that they are entitled to compensation for property by being put out of business by local option, by reason of an ordinance passed by the old territorial congress in 1787 in which it is stated that should the public exigencies make it nessecary for the common preservatioo, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same."

In 1887, just one century after the old territorial congress had put its dictum on record, the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Peter Mugler vs. the state of Kansas, rendered a decision which, for once and always, settled this question of pecuniary compensation for "property," taken by course of law, in the following unmistakable terms:

"The power which the states unquestionably have of prohibiting such use by individuals of their property as will be prejudical to the health, the morals, or the safety of the public, is not, and—consistently with the existence and safety of organized society—cannot be burdened with the condition that the state must compensate such individual owners for pecuniary losses they sustain, by reason of their not being permitted by a noxious use of their property to inflict injury upon the community. The exercise of the police power by the destruction of property which is itself a public nuisance, or the prohibition of its use in a particular way, whereby its value becomes depreciated, is very different from taking property for public use, or from depriving a person of his property without due process of law. In the one case, a nuisance only is abated; in the other, unoffending property is taken away from an innocent owner.

"It is true, that, when the defendants in these cases purchased or erected their breweries, the laws of the state did not forbid the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. But the state did not thereby give any assurance, or come under any obligation, that its legislation upon that subject would remain unchanged. Indeed, as was said in Stone vs. Mississippi, 101 U. S., the supervision of the public health and the public morals is a governmental power, 'continuing in its nature,' and 'to be dealt with as the special exigeocies of the moment may require;' and that, 'for this purpose, the largest legislative discretion is allowed, and the discretion cannot be parted with any more than the power itself.'"

Again: In Beer Company vs. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 32:

"If the public safety or the public morals require the discontinuance of any manufacture or traffic, the hand of the legislature cannot be stayed from providing for its discontinuance by any incidental inconvenience which individuals or corporations may suffer."

It seems plain, therefore, that before the liquor men can successfully establish a claim for compensation, they must prove that their breweries, distilleries and liquors are not "prejudicial to the health, the morals, or the safety of the public," and that they have not knowingly made a "noxious use of their property," thereby creating a "public nuisance."

No living liquor man can do this. Every one of them went into his miserable business with his eyes open, knowing that the better classes of society condemn it, that the license law only tolerates it and that, under the police power of the state, it may be fully prohibited any day.

All liquor men know this. Their talk about "confiscation" and "compensation" is pure buncombe, calculated for effect on minds not posted.

THEATRICAL

One of the Real Good Ones.

Plays of genuine merit deserve a cordial greeting and enthusiastic support and if all that has been said about the new production of the "Two Orphans" by Fred G. Conrad is true the engagement at the Charlevoix theater, May. 5, should be one of the most gratifying of the season to all concerned. In this production Mr. Conrad has combined the advantage of the only authorized Kate Claxton version of the great drama with a well chosen company of unusual strength. The famous central figure of the play, the blind orphan, Louise, will be acted according to all the traditions Miss Claxton established. In placing this revival of the most successful play of modern times before the public this season Mr. Conrad has been governed by a determination to avoid the mistake of trying to use some garbled adaption which destroys the strength and beauty of the play and removes from the actors the inspiration of the great opportunities offered by the characters as depicted in the Kate Claxton version. Mr. Conrad says that there are doubtless thousands of persons in the country who believe they have seen the "Two Orphans," but really have not, the "version" they saw having been only a travesty on the real grent play as written by D'Ennery and played by Miss Claxton. Mr. Conrad believes that these thousands would like to see the play as Miss Claxton, during her most brilliant season, when Janauschek was in her company playing the Countess, played it; and he has therefore secured this authorized, genuine version. Mr. Conrad announces a special equipment of scenery, costumes and other details required for a careful presentation.

During the performance of Ma's New Husband, which will be given at the Charlevoix Theater Saturday night, April 24, the following musical numbers will be rendered:

Act 1. "Love, Love, Love," "Lets Play House," "A Kiss," "Oh! Promise Me," "In Old Madrid," "Good Old U. S. A."

Act 2. "Got to See the Minstrel Show," "A Little Nonsense," "Happyland," "The Songs My Mother Used to Sing," "I Just Can't Make My Eyes Behave," comedy quartette in three minutes of grand opera.

Act 3. "Are You Sincere," "A Stick of Candy and a Jumping Jack," "Let William Tell," "Original Parody on National Airs," "Finale," "Caroline."

Are you troubled with "Blue devils?" If so the Harry Scott company guarantee a sure cure in their musical farce, "Ma's New Husband" which is to be presented on Saturday, April 24th, at the Charlevoix Theater.

No one who sees the full grown man who attempts to pose as a boy in the care of a tutor, and who afterwards marries the woman whose son he so cleverly represents himself to be, can suppress the laughter that the ocassion evokes, and he is only one of half a score of mirth-provoking characters that rush through the risible scenes of the piece. The music and lyrics are fitting accompaniments to a clever book and enhance the entertainment.

THEATRE TALK NO. 8

"AS GOOD WINE NEEDS NO BUSH" so any panegyric upon the brilliant play of "THE TWO ORPHANS" made famous by KATE CLAXTON is unneccessary. THE HOLD THAT THIS PLAY HAS IN AMERICA IS VERY GREAT, and its reputation is daily increasing. Nor is this to be wondered at, when the most glowing enconiums possible have been passed upon the play in every circle. IT IS A PLAY WHICH WILL RETAIN ITS POSITION ON THE STAGE FOR YEARS AND YEARS TO COME.

HAVE YOU EVER SEEN —A— SNARKALEE GAZHAM?

In selecting France for the action of the play, its emoticnal style is precisely of the nature to be found in that country. Though very beautiful in many respects, it has some minor faults, yet, AT THE SAME TIME, THE QUICKNESS OF ACTION, AND TELLING CLIMAXES, rivet and please an audience and push aside any imperfections.

DIALOGUE, CHARACTER, INCIDENT all combine to render this drama one of the most powerful, at the same time the most instructive, the stage has to boast.

FROM THE FIRST SCENE OF THE PLAY TO THE LAST, all is interesting, all is natural—occurrences, as in real life, give rise to passions; PASSION INSPIRES NEW THOUGHTS, ELEVATES EACH SENTIMENT, EMBELLISHES THE LANGUAGE and renders each act of the production either sweetly pathetic, or extremely sublime. YET THE HIGHEST MERIT OF ANY, IS THE MORAL WHICH THE PLAY CONTAINS.

SELDOM, IF EVER, has a play of this calibre achieved the remarkable success that has been accorded this remarkable dramatic story. It is a play for the healthy minded, intelligently inclined audiences.

WELL, THAT'S THE DINGBAT THE ACTOR PUTS IN WORK THAT GIVES IT TONE AND FINISH.

WE'D LIKE TO SEE YOU GET YOUR TICKETS AS EARLY AS POSSIBLE when they are placed on sale. There are always plenty who wait until the last minute; BUT GET THEM WHEN YOU CAN. WE'RE EXPECTING YOU. Usual prices will prevail. YOUR MONEY'S WORTH OR YOUR MONEY BACK.

Neighborhood Notes

Mancelona's attempts at reform are rather more productive than in some other northern Michigan towns. Here is what the common council did last week:

Saloon men must give a $6,000 surety bond in order to obtain the necessary license to dispense intoxicants; $5,000 was the bond required before. Some of the council were in favor of a personal bond of that amount but, as a councilman later on remarked better judgement prevailed and a surety bonds was accepted. Then happened the thing that was a surprise to many—the council said all games of chance must be abolished, especially shaking dice. Card games were given the same consideration. Slot-machines were once more put away. Nickel shows were ordered to pay a license of $10 per annum. On this question the council stood divided, the president casting the deciding vote.

A representative of the pine lands of northern Michigan at the recent meeting of the West Michigan Development Bureau, stated that in the course of ten years lands which are now considered almost worthless will be selling from $50 to $75 per acre. This seeming miracle will be performed by treating the soil with lime in quantities of from 1,000 to 1,500 pounds per acre, and then sowing alfalfa, which has roots of sufficient length to reach down to the water table and secure sufficient moisture to mature three crops per year. This alfalfa will restore the humus to the soil and make possible the raising of other crops that cannot at present be raised.

Of twenty-nine counties voting on the county good roads system, but six have accepted the system, eighteen rejected it and five have as yet failed to make returns. Kalamazoo county voted against the proposition two years ago and for it this year.

A small son of David Hull and wife of Kalkaska, while eating peanuts, recently, was attacked by a fit of coughing which resulted in lodging a bit of the nutmeat in his lung.

Persons who took out their first citizens papers a number of years ago and have not taken out their second papers had better do so before the year 1911 to prevent having their papers cancelled. Under the law of 1907, first papers become void after seven years.

Bellaire church ladies have a rather novel means of raising funds. They want to make a quarter mile foot journey, each foot to be travelled by enough pennies laid side by side to cover the space, and friends of the church are asked to travel a foot or more of the journey, of course contributing the necessary pennies.

The Northern Michigan asylum herd of Holstein-Freisian cattle is becoming more and more noted all over the state. Last week four of the animals were shipped out, including three bulls and one heifer, which were sold for prices which would seem exhorbitant for a common critter, but which are only nominal when the strain of blood is considered.

According to the report of State Health Officer Shumway of Lansing, who recently inspected the village of Antrim, which is located one mile south of Mancelona, he ordered a general cleaning up, and the doctor's expression in regard to the condition there was "It is the filthiest hole in Michigan."

Prof. W. J. Beal, botanist at the Michigan Agricultural college, states that there are now 216 varities of weeds in the state to plague the farmer, as compared to 35 varities in its earlier day, all of which are indigenous. The increase he attributes largely to the sale of seeds in which the weeds are liberally mixed, and he advocates some regulation to protect the state. He also favors some energetic means for destroying crops of weeds now started. The pest, he claims, is almost as bad in cities on vacant lots as in the country. He predicts that unless something is done soon the number will double in ten years.

Lying senseless on the carriage which conveys logs to a big circular saw in the Lapham sawmill in Ensley township near White Cloud, Isaac Wing, forty-five years old, employed at the mill as a swager, was carried to the saw and was cut half in two meeting instant death. His heart was bisected.

Wing was some distance from the saw when Thomas Herron, the sawyer, left the room for a moment. When Herron returned he found Wing lying on the carriage and the saw half way through his body. How Wing came to fall upon the carriage is a mystery.

A STARTLING STATEMENT

New York Medical Authorities Claim Dyspepsia Causes Consumption.

The post mortem statistics of the big New York hospitals show that some cases of consumption are due to unchecked dyspepsia, especially when the victim was predisposed to tuberculosis.

Dyspepsia wears out the body and brain, the weakened irritable stomach is unable to digest food the body does not receive the required nourishment, constipation ensues and the victim becomes thin, weak and haggard. As a result, the body becomes a fertile field for the germs of disease to lodge and flourish.

Therefore, the person who permits dyspepsia to progress unhindered is guilty of contributing toward the development of one of the most insidious and fatal diseases known to mankind.

Dyspepsia is curable if properly treated. The Ivy Drug store sells a remedy which they positively guarantee will cure indigestion or dyspepsia or they will pay for all the medicine used during the trial. This remedy is an absolutely new medical discovery and has been named Rexall Dyspepsia Tablets. Certainly no offer could be more fair, and the offer of the Ivy Drug store is proof positive that Rexall Dyspepsia Tablets are a dependable and infallible remedy. Inasmuch as the medicine will cost you nothing if it does not benefit you we urge you who are suffering with indigestion or dyspepsia to try this remedy. A twenty-five cent box of Rexall Dyspepsia Tablets contains enough medicine for fifteen days' treatment. Remember Rexall Dyspepsia Tablets are only sold in Charlevoix, by the Ivy Drug Store, A. B. Fleischer, proprietor.

How to Cure a Sore Throat.

A gargle that has quickly banished many a bad sore throat is made by dissolving a teaspoonful of powdered borax in a tumbler of water. This can be used either hot or cold, but should not be swallowed. If the borax gargle is not liked, strong salt water is an excellent substitute. It can be used many times a day. The good results are in reason by snuffing the salt water up through the nostrils and back through the throat. A teaspoonful of salt to a glass of water is strong enough, especially if the nose and throat are sensitive. This salt water gargle is used several times a day by one trained nurse who has had many diphtheria patients without succumbing to the disease.

How to Wash Silk Gloves.

Silk gloves can be washed like any ordinary material, though it is best to soak colored ones in salt water before washing them, especially if the colors are not substantial. After rinsing the gloves turn them wrong side out and hang in a shady place to dry. Do not sprinkle them before ironing, but dampen a towel, roll them in it and leave for an hour or two. Iron the gloves on the wrong side, as it raises the thread on the right. When perfectly dry turn them, and you will be pleased to see they look like new ones. Use bluing in the rinse water for all gloves.

How to Freshen Feather Pillows.

Feather pillows may be freshened and the feathers made light by placing them out of doors in a clean spot during a hard rain. Let them be thoroughly wet and then hang in a warm place to dry. Spots on the pillow cover may be removed with a paste of water and fuller's earth. Another way to clean the feathers is to place them in a cheesecloth bag and wash them in warm soapy water, followed by several rinsings in clean water. Feathers should never be placed in the sun.

How to Keep Black Stockings Black.

Black stockings are apt to assume a peculiar greenish look after repeated washings. A simple way of preserving the color is to wash them with soap that is free from soda and to add to the last rinsing water a teaspoonful of good vinegar. The stockings should be wrong out and clapped into shape. A hot iron will destroy the color of stockings, particularly if they are wet.

How to Enter a Burning Room Safely.

In case of fire, when it is necessary to enter a burning room or one choked with smoke, a wet silk handkerchief, tied in one layer over the face, is a complete and certain preventive against suffocation by the smoke. By this means the smoke is entirely excluded from the lungs, and yet it is possible to breathe freely.

HOW TO KEEP A HORSE HAPPY

Practical Suggestions For Cold Weather From a Veterinary.

The great prevalence of diseases of the respiratory organs in horses every spring, says a well known horse doctor, is largely due to the weakening of the system by sudden chills caused by standing in rain or sleet, especially when perspiring, and to carelessness in blanketing. Then comes the shock of the cold northwest storms frequent in winter, when the temperature hovers around zero, and in consequence the animal becomes too feeble to resist disease.

Be sure if your horse is stabled in a cold or drafty place that he is well blanketed, and there should be a change of blankets, for to make him stand under a blanket which is wet either from sweat or from snow or rain is much worse than giving him no blanket at all.

Blankets for street use should be large enough to cover the horse from neck to tail and should come well down all around, and chest pads are of great service. When the horse is making delivery trips with frequent stops the blanket may be folded across the withers when the animal is in action.

Coal delivery horses should be provided with blankets reaching nearly to the ground, and again the use of chest pads is to be commended. Owing to the hardship of their task these animals are often forced into perspiration even in very cold weather. They are, therefore, entitled to even greater consideration and must have it if their health and usefulness are to be maintained.

Cab horses should likewise be blanketed with great care, since they are often obliged to stand severe exposure, and the special blankets made for them should be in general use.

No horse should be forced to stand even for a few minutes during severe weather without a covering. Above all, see to it that when standing in a chill stable dry blankets are provided and used. Whatever you do, don't blanket your horse while it is in action. There is no more certain means of inducing serious if not fatal illness, since the blanket is certain to become moist from sweat and to cause a chill the moment the animal stands.

One other suggestion which will add greatly to the health and comfort of your horse. If the sun is shining on a cold day, be sure to have your horse stand on the sunny side of the street. Lots of drivers do this, but the practice should be universal, for, with the very slightest inconvenience to yourself, you are giving your animal the benefit of the heat and the genuine tonic of a sun bath.

STYLES IN INVITATIONS.

How They Should Be Written and Addressed Correctly.

Women write on the first and third pages of a sheet of note paper, leaving the second and fourth pages blank, but in social life this practice is better avoided. And postscripts are now more honored in the breach than the observance. A few people write their initials or their name in full in the corner of the envelope, but this is a mere fad and too often serves as a concession to curiosity. When a note is sent by hand that needs a reply, the word "Answer" should be written on the top of the envelope, and "No answer" usually appears when no response is required. "Please forward" is the correct term when a letter may have to be readdressed, and "Faire suivre" is its French equivalent. When a letter begins "Dear Sir" or "Madam" the name of the person addressed must be written at the end of the letter, "To John White, Esq." "To the Manager of the Chicago Telephone Company," "To the Editor of the Chicago Tribune."

Notes of invitation to luncheon should be brief and couched in the simplest terms available. The expression "Will you give us the pleasure of your company?" sounds out of date and pretentious. The word "luncheon" must be used, as "lunch" belongs to the list of what are termed "second rate expressions." A note to an intimate friend might run thus: "Will you and your husband luncheon with us next Tuesday, the 3d, at 2 o'clock? Hoping to see you, I remain, yours sincerely," etc. But if the invitation happens to be written to some one less well known the note might be worded as follows: "Dear Mrs. Martin, if you have nothing better to do, will you luncheon with us on Friday next, the 1st, at 1:45? Hoping to have the pleasure of seeing you," etc. And if the husband is invited he should be styled "Mr. Martin."

In all cases where you are in doubt it is better to err on the side of simplicity. Everybody admires common sense and directness of expression, and, regardless of set forms, you cannot go far wrong if you say what there is to be said in well chosen and simple words. Naturalness always is in good taste, and the most critical persons are quickest to detect the high flown affectation of a writer who tries to "put on style" and only manages to be artificial.

How to Cure a Nervous Headache.

Are you bothered with nervous headaches? Here is one of the simplest yet most effective cures. All that is required is an empty beer bottle or even the rolling pin. Anything will do, in fact, if it is round and hard. Lie down flat upon your back, and place the bottle under the back of the neck, allowing the weight of the head to press down the neck hard against the bottle. Retain this position for five or ten minutes and note how the headache gradually disappears. The pressure cures because it presses down upon two large nerves in the back of the neck, causing them to rest or sleep for the number of minutes the pressure is maintained. This rest allows the nerves to be toned up to normal condition. The treatment is intended for the nervous headache. It will have no effect upon the sick headache, wherein the stomach is the cause.

How to Wash Chiffon Veils.

Make a suds of warm water and a good pure white soap, dip the chiffon veil in and squeeze the veil gently until all the soil has disappeared. Do not rub at all. Rinse in several waters and pin out on the bed or a flat surface, over which spread a clean sheet, and just before it is dry iron under a clean white cloth. If one does not object to a crispy appearance it is not necessary to iron chiffon veils at all. Black veils are greatly improved if rusty looking by giving them alcohol and ammonia—a large spoonful of ammonia to enough alcohol to successfully immerse the veil. Dip it in and squeeze out without wringing and pin out on a sheet to dry.

How to Keep White Shelves.

Keeping white shelves in the pantry often means a great deal of scrubbing. This need not be so if the shelves are covered with white oilcloth, such as is used for tables. Cut the oilcloth in long strips about three inches wider than the shelves. Make flour paste and with it stick the oilcloth on the shelves, covering the front edge and pasting it underneath and letting the oilcloth come up about an inch against the wall at the back. Shelves covered with oilcloth will keep tidy for years and only need wiping over with a cloth and warm water to clean them.

How to Make Dainty Sandwiches.

If a housekeeper has grown tired of the conventional sandwich, she should try those made of salmon. They are most palatable. The salmon is flaked and moistened with mayonnaise and then put as a filling between two extra thin slices of brown bread with the crust cut off. Sweet sandwiches are also in fashion for luncheons and after theater parties. The newest ones, served by a clever housewife, have a filling of candied cherries chopped fine and moistened with orange juice.

How Vegetables Should Be Salted.

Some cooks who count themselves well nigh professionals often do not know quite simple rules of cooking. One of these is in regard to the salting. All green vegetables should be salted while cooking. Those that grow underground should not be salted until after they are cooked. Both kinds should be put over the fire in boiling water instead of cold.

A FLOWER LEGEND.

How the Myosotis Came to Be Called Forgetmenot.

Dr. A. P. Thomson communicated to Mills' "History of Chivalry" the following romantic account of the origin of the popular name, forgetmenot, of the favorite little flower myosotis: "Two lovers were loitering on the margin of a lake on a fine summer's evening when the maiden espied some of the flowers of myosotis growing on the water close to the bank of an island at some distance from the shore. She expressed a desire to possess them, when the knight, in the true spirit of chivalry, plunged into the water and, swimming to the spot, cropped the wished for plant, but his strength was unable to fulfill the object of his achievement, and, feeling that he could not regain the shore, although very near it, he threw the flowers upon the bank, and, casting a last affectionate look upon his ladylove, he cried 'Forget me not!' and was buried in the waters. As the world insists upon a reason, this story is as good as another, but the worthy knight must have been sadly out of his element not to have been able to return from a bank on which his mistress could discern so minute a blossom, unless, indeed, we suppose him to have been clad in armor, which was a habiliment ill adapted for a lover by land or water."

A terrific tropical storm, a dynamite explosion in the ship's coal disabling her engines, mutiny in the crew and cannibals without conspire against the brave and gallant captain of the Kansas. The presence among the passengers of a charming young woman, heroic as the captain himself, throws the glamour of a love romance over the perils of the deep. Told in the author's captivating style it makes a tale of the sea irresistible in its charm. That is why

It Will Be Printed in This Paper

THE thrilling incidents of this story were obtained from the log of the good ship Kansas, Captain Courtenay, bound from Valparaiso to London. She carried a small number of select passengers and a valuable cargo of copper intended to break the European corner on that metal. That is why unprincipled men in the copper pool employed a villain to put dynamite in the ship's coal bunkers, confident she would encounter a storm before she was clear of the Straits of Magellan, for with the engines out of commission the ship could hardly hope to weather the gale. Whether Neptune was in the pool or not we do not know, but it is certain there was some fierce blowing on the second day out when, nearing Desolation Island, the engines were stopped by an explosion. Things happened quickly then. With the disabled ship, the killed and wounded stokers, the mutinous crew and a terrific sea, Captain Courtenay had his seamanship put to a severe test. If the Captain was a hero Elsie Maxwell was doubly a heroine for she had only a woman's heart and feminine charms to match a sailor's

If you remember the slump in copper you will conclude the Kansas finally reached port. FARMING BY ELECTRICITY.

Germany Has Tried It, Will the American Follow?

Electric farming? Why not? The time was when a suggestion that the farmer in this country would have his mail delivered in a box nailed to his front gatepost would have been laughed down. But the time came, and the old style of traveling a long distance in cold and heat over rough roads to the nearest village once a week for letters and newspapers passed out forever in most parts of the country.

Then it was suggested that the farmer might get the news of quotations on products of the soil and live stock and arrange his deals by telephone while he was in his family room and that the wires which would carry the information would be constructed out of the wires of his fence. The farmer and others laughed at this idea. But the thing was done, and now the modern farmhouse has its phone the same as the city office and the city home.

ELECTRIC GRINDING.

Will we come to electric farming? It has come in Germany, and the American farmer is not behind the farmer of Germany or any other country in intelligence and progressiveness. If electricity benefits the German farmer, why shouldn't it benefit the American farmer?

The use of electric power on large farm operations has already been highly developed in some localities in Germany. The plan is to place a central power plant at the points where it will be convenient for the nearby population.

The electricity is collected in storage batteries, which are then mounted on wheels and taken wherever the power is needed. One of these traveling batteries may be connected with a farmer's power wood saw to work up the winter's supply in a few hours. Then the battery is moved to the next farm, where it may connect with the grain mill, as shown in one of the illustrations.

ELECTRIC PLOWING.

Another set of batteries is shown as a truck and dragging a gang plow. Another storage truck at the opposite side of the field draws the plow back again. Besides the portable form of electric power, the establishment supplies light, heat and permanent power wherever required in the neighborhood.

CULTURE OF GRAPES.

Don't Prune Vines Until Chilly Weather Is Over.

Grapevines should not be pruned until cold weather has entirely passed. Any time in April is soon enough. The middle of the month in more northerly sections is the surest date. Vines pruned just before the buds commence to swell may bleed a little, but this will cease as soon as growth starts and will do less injury to the vine than early pruning. As a general rule, the buds farther out on the canes grow the best clusters of grapes. Prune the canes to the proper length, two arms four feet in length, with spurs having two or three buds to the spur. Tie the arms to the trellis bars, so the clusters of fruit will hang down, with plenty of light and air, and they will be free from rot and mildew, the grapes ripening early and fully. The ground between the rows and under the trellis bars must be kept clean and the soil mellow to take in the dews and light rains. When the grapes commence to swell spread a thick coat of fine rotted manure, mixed with fine cut grass, around the vines, and one foot out from the grape on each side. This mulch will keep the ground moist and cool, which will permit a greater development of the fruit.

The vines should be planted in rows eight feet apart, planting one grape eight feet apart in the rows. This will give plenty of room for horse culture and for the air and sunshine, which are necessary for best development of both vine and fruit. By this method the vineyard can be cheaply and quickly cultivated, the canes tied up as they advance in growth and sprayed. The bunches of fruit will hang down through the foliage, which will prevent mildew and rot. The following year two canes near the head or junction of the arms are taken and the old canes cut off and removed. In this way we have a new growth of well ripened wood and are sure to be rewarded, when proper care is given, with an abundance of choice, well ripened clusters of grapes. The best fertilizer for grapes is rich, well rotted manure mixed with one-half peck of fine ground animal bonement to each bushel of manure. Mix the two together, spread it evenly under the trellis bars the latter part of October and cover with a light furrow run on each side of the row of grapes, or turn under with the digging fork. This dressing, besides supplying the fertilizing matter necessary for the growth of the vines and profection of the fruit, will make a mellow soil that will hold the moisture and make a deep soil easy for the roots to spread out and make stroag, healthy growth. Grapes may be set out this month or in October. Select any land. Land that will grow the regular farm crops will grow choice grapes. Plant two-year-old vines. Good, stocky vines may be had for 10 cents each for family eating. Twenty vines properly planted and cared for will give an ubundant supply of fruit. The Concord, Niagara, Clinton, Catawba, Salem and Campbell Early are standard varieties of estabilished merit.

Feeding the Dairy Calf.

Never let the dairy calf stop growing a day. Keep it well fed with growing feeds. Fresh, warm skimmilk with ground corn and oats is a fine ration. Do not keep feed before it always. Let it get hungry between meals and then fill it and watch its digestion. Develop its paunch by filling it. The cow that stores much can milk much

One of the topics for discussion at the South Arm Pomona, that was passed by for lack of time, was the question, "How will our subordinate grange be benefited by local option?" In assigning this question, the lecturer's idea was to have the question discussed from a narrow point of view, leaving out entirely the benefit which will come to a grange in common with everybody in the adoption of the new order of things.

We believe that a subordinate grange has a duty before it in looking after the farm boys, if you have any in your vicinity, who unfortunately have formed the habit of going to the village after their week's toil and finding their amusement in the places which are now wiped out. Tell them that the grange offers a place where they can find recreation and, at the same time, instruction, interest them in it and they will make the very best members and to the grange will another sheaf of victory be added.

FORMALIN TREATMENT OF OATS

As Recommended by the Experiment Station.

Enormous losses occur annually from the reduction of oat yields by the ravages of smut. This loss can be largely if not entirely avoided by treating the seed with a formalin solution.

Formalin is a 40 per cent solution of formaldehyde; it can be procured from or by local druggists; the standard strength should be guaranteed. The solution most commonly used is made by adding one pound or pint of formalin to from forty to fifty gallons of water.

The treatment may be applied in one of two ways, viz:

(1.) Clean carefully a large area of the granary or barn floor and saturate with solution; upon this spread a layer of grain several or more inches in depth. Apply formaldehyde solution to grain with a garden sprinkler and stir well with shovel. Repeat the sprinkling and stirring until the grain is thoroughly moistened and then shovel into the smallest sized pile possible, where it should remain for not less than two hours. Then spread the grain and dry it sufficiently to pass through the drill if to be sown at once, or dry perfectly if seeding is delayed.

(2.) Put the grain in gunny sacks, about 1½ bushels to each, and immerse from five to ten minutes in a barrel, tank, trough, tub or other receptable containing the formalin solution. A draining board can be used to return the drip, thus saving both time and material. Dry as heretofore described under 1. Drying may be hastened, in both cases by spreading the grain on canvas sheets out in the air and sunlight. Bags or sacks other than those used for dipping should be treated, including the grain drill.

In adjusting the seeder, allowance must be made for the swelling of the grain. Formalin should not be added to the water until ready for use. The results secured will depend largely on thoroughness of application.

The same methods will apply in the case of barley.

PRUNING THE PEAR TREE.

What to Cut, How to Cut and Why the Cut.

It may be safely assumed that all modern farmers are interested in fruit. Next to the apple, there is no fruit in such general demand as the pear. How to make a pear tree most productive is a subject that must interest every fruit raiser. Success begins with proper pruning.

In pruning the pear orchard a symmetrical shape should be given the trees, according to the form that the grower has decided upon. The pyramidal form is preferable, trimmed to a leader. This is begun when the tree is young by cutting the lower branches to four or five buds, the higher ones a little shorter, and so on to the leader, which should be left longest.

The cutting back and thinning out must continue annually to obtain the highest results. How closely this should be done depends upon the variety and the vigor of the tree. Some trees have a tendency to set more fruit than do others. It is necessary to watch the orchard and trim trees so inclined more severely; otherwise they will overbear and, becoming exhausted, go into decline.

If a tree has become exhausted and stunted from overbearing or other cause it may be revived by cutting back into the old wood and allowing the tree to make a top of new wood. This has been repeatedly and successfully done.

The person who trims should be able to tell what to cut, how to cut, why he cuts and the probable effect of the pruning upon the tree. If he cannot give a reason for everything he does he is an unsafe man to trust in trimming a pear orchard.

Two crops of clover will remove eighty-three pounds of nitrogen, fifteen pounds of phosphoric acid and eighty-eight pounds of potash.

A ton of timothy alone removes twenty-five pounds of nitrogen, ten and one-half pounds of phosphoric acid and eighteen pounds of potash.

A twenty-five bushel crop of wheat will take off fifty-three pounds of nitrogen, fifteen pounds of phosphoric acid and twenty-three pounds of potash.

It is said that a fifty bushel crop of corn will rob the soil of thirty-two and one-half pounds of nitrogen, thirty-one pounds of phosphoric acid and sixty-five pounds of potash.

A mixed crop of clover and timothy amounting to one and a half tons per acre takes fifty-nine pounds of nitrogen, fourteen pounds of phosphoric acid and forty-six pounds of potash.

Farmers' bulletin No. 49 of the United States department of agriculture says that a mixture of two parts of cornmeal and one part cottonseed meal fed for ten weeks to lambs with pasturage gave a weekly gain of 2.95 pounds per head. The lambs were fed about eight and one-half pounds each per week of the mixture.

The Louisiana experiment station has been studying blind staggers in horses, its cause and cure, but nothing definite could be found. It is their opinion that the cause of the disease is in some way associated with the conditions of the feeding materials, such as grass or cereal products of corn, brought about by the attacks of mold or fungus.

In response to invitations sent out by officers of the Good Citizenship League, over one hundred citizens of East Jordan assembled at the Opera House Monday evening to talk over and formulate plans toward enforcing the liquor law as well as other laws in our community. A paper was circulated and signed by every man present pledging their support to the movement. Several short talks were given and the Jordan Glee Club rendered a couple of selections. The League is officered by President, E. A. Lewis; Vice President, W. P. Sqiiers; secretary, Rev. W. W. Lamport; treasurer, L. A. This morning (four days after the great battle) I went to visit the field of Waterloo, • • • but on arrival there the sight was too horrible to behold. I felt sick in the stomach and was obliged to return. The multitude of carcasses, the heaps of wounded men with mangled limbs, unable to move and perishing from not having their wounds dressed or from hunger, as the allies were, of course, obliged to take their surgeons and wagons with them, formed a spectacle I shall not forget. • • • At Hougomont, where there is an orchard, every tree is pierced with bullets. The farms are all burnt down, and in the courtyard it is said they have been obliged to burn upward of a thousand carcasses, an awful holocaust to the war demon.—From "Reminiscences of European Travel, 1815-1849," by Major W. PROPER CARE OF ORCHARDS

Valuable Bulletin Issued by Agricultural College

WHEN TO SPRAY AND WHEN TO PRUNE

So as to Make the Largest Profit on Crop

Best Varieties for the Michigan Horticulturist—One of Charlevoix County's Money Making Industries.

Never before in the history of the state have Michigan people been compelled to pay such high prices for apples as have prevailed during the past winter. When apples sell for more than oranges in Michigan markets, it ought to be time for Michigan farmers to become inspired with the thought of caring for their orchards. The Michigan State Agriculture college has recently issued bulletin No. 233, dealing with the subject of apple culture, from which The COURIER is pleased to publish the following practical suggestions.

Upon many Michigan farms are mature apple orchards that have been neglected for many years and have produced no income further than an occasional small crop of apples of uncertain quality.

With a little investment and a little work at the proper time many of these orchards—if located upon congenial soil and not too old—can be made to return a cash income that will be an important item in the farm economy.

An account in detail, of the methods used and results secured with such orchards, handled in connection with general farming, is herein given by Mr. S. B. Hartman, of Athens, Calhoun county. His results should stimulate farmers to make an effort to turn similar orchards into a source of profit and fruit supply for home use.

The first orchard consists of 30 trees, most of which are about 30 years old. This orchard has been in sod and used as a hog pasture for at least 15 years, and previous to 5 years ago had never had a good pruning. The varities and number of trees of each variety are as follows: 11 Stark, 3 Maiden Blush, 3 Winter Rambo, 2 Ben Davis, 2 Steel Red, 2 Golden Russet, 2 Rhode Island Greening, 1 Winter Pippin, 1 Famense, 1 Yellow Transparent.

The second orchard consisting of 14 trees is a remnant of the old orchard on another part of the farm, the average age being about 40 years. These trees are scattered and the ground has been used in a regular rotation of farm crops. Varieties are as follows: 4 Northern Spy, 2 Jonathan, 4 Ben Davis, 2 Russet, 2 Baldwinh, 1 Pippin.

The third orchard consisting of 8 trees is a remnant of an old orchard on the home farm. Two of the trees are younger, but most of them are 50 to 60 years of age. The orchard has been in a regular rotation of crops, but is now included in a young orchard. Varieties are as follows: 3 Northern Spy, 2 King, 1 Bellflower, 1 Tolman Sweet, 1 Red Astrachan.

In all there are 52 trees, which if collected and placed 36 ft apart would cover 1.6 acres at 30 trees to the acre.

Work and results for the first year, 1904.

Nothing was done to the orchard this season except to pick the fruit, which for some years previous had been allowed to go to waste. Apples were abundant this year and prices very low. The writer had taught school the previous year and had the farm work to do during the summer, but found time during the fall to pick the apples rather than see them go to waste. The only money expended in harvesting was $7 for help in picking. No provision had been made for shipping, so most of the fruit was sold to local buyers at 40 cents per hundred weight, or about 20 cents per bushel. We drove four miles to the orchard in the morning, put the apples into the crates from the picking sacks and drove home with the load in the evening unloading at the car the next morning. In all about a carload of apples were sold for $120.37. Money costs, including, shipping boxes purchased later and packing were $19.34, leaving a net balance of $107.03 to pay for 18 days labor of myself and team or about $6 per day.

Fifty-three bushels of the best of this fruit were sorted out, packed in bushel apple boxes and consigned to a Chicago firm. These sold for 85 cents per box. This set me to thinking that if this fruit could be cared for that a larger per cent would be perfect, the increased receipts would more than offset the added expense. Accordingly we prepared to give the orchard some care the following season.

Work and results second year 1905.

A good brass pump with two leads of 20-foot hose, 8 and 10-foot bamboo brass-lined extension rods two double vermorel nozzles and a good brass strainer were purchased the entire outfit costing $27.50.

The orchard of 8 trees near home was pruned at a cost of $2, but help was scarce and spring work pressing, and no pruning was done on the other orchards.

The pruned orchard was sprayed four times, a part of the other trees twice, with Bordeaux mixture just after blossoming, at a cost of $15 for labor and materials.

This was an off year and the crop very light, yet it was better and larger than in the neighboring orchards and the foliage had a more healthy appearance and remained on the trees longer in the fall.

The cost, including labor of picking, grading, packing and marketing the crop was $13.70; packages of early apples, $1.56; pruning, $2 and spraying $15, as noted above; total expense for the season, $32.26.

The late apples were consigned to a Chicago firm, selling for 90 cents and $1 per bushel and the early apples were sold to neighbors at from 50 cents to 85 cents per bushel, the total being $46.23, leaving a net balance of $13.97.

No account was made of the apples used by three families. Hired labor was charged at cost; my time at $1 per day; team at $1 per day.

DIED FROM EXPOSURE

John Dufore's Body Found in Road Thursday

Had been resident of East Jordan for Thirty-two years.

W. C. Burdick, while driving along the Pleasant Valley road Thursday morning found the dead body of John Dufore of East Jordan, lying along the side of the road four miles from Boyne City, on top of the hill beyond a patch of woods. He notified Coroner Marshall, who went out and brought the body of the unfortunate man to Boyne City. He evidently fell down and could not get up again.

The snow and cold winds of Wednesday night chilled him as he was lying on the damp ground and he died alone from the effects of the exposure. His age is between sixty-five and seventy. He leaves two children, one married daughter, Mrs. Farmer, who resides in East Jordan and one son Leonard Dufore also of East Jordan. He lived with a cousin at Intermediate Lake, Mr. Peter Dufore. He has been more or less ailing from one thing and another all winter.

He has several relatives in Boyne City, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Dufore and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Dufore being cousins of the dead man. The deceased has been a resident of East Jordan for over thirty-two years and is known by everyone.

The remains were taken to East Jordan by Mr. Whittington of that place and his son Leonard.

The funeral occured Saturday at the undertaking parlors of Mr. Whittington.

BOUND OVER TO CIRCUIT

Clarion Couple Waived Examination and Gave Bail.

Barney Kleinheinz and Edith Fry, the parties from Clarion who have been under arrest for the past few days, waived examination before Judge Hammond, of Boyne City, last week and were bound over to the next term of the circuit court for trial. The amount of the bond was fixed at $1000. Messrs. Henry Burch and W. H. Murner, of Boyne Falls, signed the bond and the parties were released.

WILL HAVE ROOMS

For Reading and Where Games Can be Played

Journal Outlines the Plans for Boyne City Under New Order.

The secretaries of the local unions met with the committee of three as agreed upon in the First National Bank to formulate plans for the game and reading rooms that have been proposed. After consultation and informal talk the needs of the workingmen were agreed upon and a report will be made to those who are the promoters of the plan and a building will probably soon be secured and the plan put into operation. No location has been chosen as yet but several have been considered. One that appears to be especially adapted is the Beardsley block on Lake street. It has been found to be quite well suited for the purpose as the front can be used for a waiting room and the rear for games and sports. We also understand that a doorway can easily be made through into the Miller pool room and that arrangements can be made for the use of the tables at a small fee. The second story would make an excellent reading room and as it overlooks the lake with an unobstructed view for the whole length it would be nicely adapted for the longshoremen for they could easily discover the coming of boats. However other sites will be considered and the best one will likely be chosen.

BADE HER FAREWELL

Mrs. Small Surprised Before Leaving for Her New Home.

Over thirty neighbors and friends gathered at the home of Mrs. Captain Small Thursday afternoon to bid farewell to Mrs. Small, who leaves in a few days for Sheboygan, Wisconsin, which will be their future home. A bounteous pot luck supper was served by the ladies, after which a cut glass berry dish was presented.

Mrs. Small will be greatly missed by a large circle of friends and in going to her new home the best wishes of all attend her.

Tuesday evening Mrs. Small resigned as past commander of White Rose Hive, L. O. T. M. M., and the Hive presented her with a silver butter knife and gold berry spoon in appreciation of her tireless work for the order.

STATE WIDE PROHIBITION

Anti-Saloon League Figures on Submission of Amendment to Constitution.

Two years hence will see Michigan in the throes of a fight over the question of state wide prohibition. This is promised by the Anti-Saloon league and is made contingent only upon the showing to be made next year on the local option proposition.

Attorney Pliny Marsh, of the Anti Saloon league, who has been one of the principal figures of the state in the liquor fight, said that the state-wide prohibition feature would be an issue in the legislature in 1911.

If the league makes another good showing in the campaign for local option next spring, it will feel justified, he says, in making the fight state-wide. The league will go after an amendment to the constitution because it is doubtful of the statute's permanency.

EIGHTH GRADE EXAMINATION

The annual eighth grade examination will be held on Thursday and Friday, May 6th and 7th, 1909, beginning at 8:30 A. M.

The examination in Reading will be based on Hinwatha.

Pupils will be expected to furnish legal cap paper and may write the examination with pencil.

Papers will not be returned to the pupils but the records will be subject to examination by anyone at any time.

Examinations will be conducted in the following places:

Boyne City, Charlevoix, East Jordan, (west side) Boyne Falls, Clarion and St. James.

The eighth grade diploma will admit the holder to any high school in the state and to the freshman class of the Michigan Agricultural college without further examination.

MEET AT PETOSKEY

Northern Michigan Press Club Will Meet May 6 and 7.

J. N. Tinklepaugh, secretary of the Northern Michigan Press club, has sent out the following notice of the meeting on May 6 and 7, to the members:

Dear Brother: The Northern Michigan Press club will enjoy the hospitality of Peerless Petoskey on above dates with Brother Churchill as chaperon. You all know what that means. Don't miss this opportunity to imagine that you are a millionaire tourist for a couple of days, and plan to be present. Brother Churchill is sitting up nights planning how best to entertain you and as soon as he exhausts all the possibilities along those lines I will send you a program. But please fill out and mail the enclosed postal card at once, so that President Churchill may know just how many guests he will have on above dates.

Fraternally yours,
J. N. TINKLEPAUGH,
Secretary.

If not already a member, come just the same. The more the merrier.

HELPFUL HINTS ON HAIR HEALTH

Scalp and Hair Troubles Generally Caused by Carelessness.

Dandruff is a contagious disease caused by a microbe which also produces baldness. Never use a comb or brush belonging to someone else. No matter how cleanly the owner may be, these articles may be infected with microbes, which will infect your scalp. It is far easier to catch hair microbes than it is to get rid of them, and a single stroke of an infected comb or brush often produces the cause of baldness. Never try on anybody else's but for the reason that many a hathand is a nesting place for microbes.

If you happen to be troubled with dandruff, itching scalp, falling hair or baldness, we have a remedy which we positively know will cure these troubles, and we are so sure of this that we offer it to you with the understanding that it will cost you nothing for the trial if it does not produce the results we claim. This remedy is called Rexall "93" Hair Tonic. It is the most scientific remedy for all scalp and hair troubles, and we know of nothing else that equals it for effectiveness. We know this because of results it has produced in hundreds of cases.

Rexall "93" Hair Tonic will positively banish dandruff permanently, restore natural color when its loss has been brought about by disease, and make the hair naturally silky, soft and glossy. It does this because it stimulates the hair follicles, removes dandruff, destroys the germ matter, and brings about a free, healthy circulation of blood which nourishes the hair roots, causing them to tighten and grow new hair. We want everybody in Charlevoix who has any trouble with hair or scalp to know that Rexall "93" Hair Tonic is the best hair tonic and restorative in existence, and no one should scoff at or doubt this statement until they have put our claims to a fair test, with the understanding that they pay us nothing for the remedy if it does not give full and complete satisfaction in every particular. NEAT PARLOR TRICK.

Sleight of Hand Feat That Mystifies if Well Performed.

Lay the piece of wood across the palm of your left hand, which keep wide open, with the thumb and all the fingers far apart, lest you be suspected of supporting the wood with them. Next take your left wrist in your right hand and grasp it tightly for the purpose, as you state, of giving the hand more steadiness. Now suddenly turn the back of your left hand uppermost, and as your wrist moves in your right hand stretch out the forefinger of your right hand, and as soon as the wood comes undermost support it with such forefinger (Fig. 1). Now shake the hand and after a moment or two suffer the wood to drop. It is two to one that the spectators will admit it to be produced by the action of the air, as you had previously stated, and try to do it themselves. But of course they must, unless you have performed the feat so awkwardly as to be discovered, fail in its performance.

If you have no objection to reveal the secret you can do it again and while they are gravely philosophizing upon it suddenly lift up your hand (Fig. 2) and expose the trick. This will doubtless create much amusement. Observe that in doing this feat you must keep your fingers so low that no one can see the palm of your left hand and move your finger so carefully that its action may not be detected, and if it be not you may rest assured that its absence from around the wrist of the left hand will not be discovered, some of the fingers being naturally supposed to be under the cuff, so that if the spectators only see two or even one they will imagine the others are beneath the cuff.

LOCOMOTIVE SIGNALS.

Meaning of the Various Whistle Blasts Blown by the Engineer.

The railroad manager took a piece of paper and jotted down on it in dashes the several whistle signals in common use by all American railroads, accompanying each with a few words of explanation. Then he read as follows:

"One long blast (thus: —) must be sounded when approaching stations, junctions or crossings of other railroads.

"Two long and two short blasts (like this: — — · · —) are sounded just before crossing a wagon road.

"One short blast (thus: ·) is the call for breaks, and two long ones (like this: — —) order them to be loosed or thrown off.

"Two short blasts (thus: · ·) are an answering signal and mean 'All right, I understand,' while three short blasts (like this: · · ·), to be repeated until acknowledged by the waving of a flag or lantern, mean 'I want to back the train as soon as you are ready.'

"Four long blasts (so: — — — —) call in any flagman who may have been sent out in the east or north, while four long blasts and one short one (like this: — — — — ·) call in a flagman from the west or south.

"Four short blasts (thus: · · · ·) are the engineman's impatient call to firemen, switch tenders or trainmen demanding 'Why don't you show the signal for me to go ahead?' or 'What is the matter?'

"When a train is standing, five short blasts (such as these: · · · · ·) are the order for a brakeman to run back along the track and display a danger signal for the next following train."

A Musical Evening.

The next time you have company give each guest a sheet of paper and a pencil. Then show them a table on which are displayed the following articles and ask them to write down a musical term represented by each one:

A quire of paper—choir. An open knife—sharp. Pieces of rope—chords. A pair of scales—scale. A Yale key—key. A large cane—staff. Quantity of pitch—pitch. A tape measure—measure. A written letter—note. A potpourri jar—potpourri.

When you have allowed sufficient time for all to answer all the numbers collect the papers and award a prize to the one having most correct answers. The latest topical song is an appropriate prize.

An Easy Parlor Trick.

Balance a cane on the back of a chair and bet any one that you will make it fall without touching it, blowing on it or moving the chair.

All you need to do is to dry a card well before a fire, rub it vigorously with your sleeve and put close to the end of the cane, which will follow it, as iron follows a magnet, until, after losing its equilibrium, the cane will drop to the floor.

Where the sash of the upper and lower windows meet drill a hole with a brace and bit deep enough to go completely through the sash of the lower window and halfway through the sash of the upper window. Insert a heavy nail or small spike of the same length as the hole you have drilled. This fastens the windows together so firmly that nothing short of a crowbar, with its attendant noise, can pry them apart. The nail is removed easily to open the windows.

HEALTH AND BEAUTY.

Peroxide is something that should be used sparingly, if at all, and only under the advice of one who makes treatment of the hair and scalp a specialty.

Continuous reading on railway journeys is bad for the sight. Always read in a good, steady light. Rest the eyes occasionally when working by looking into the distance or lowering the lids.

The eyebrows give expression to the face almost as much as the eyes themselves. One can do a great deal to alter and improve the shape of the brows by gentle stroking between the fingers daily. The fingers should be well moistened with olive oil or vaseline, which stimulates growth.

Lavender scented sheets are said to induce sweet slumbers. The odor is exceedingly fresh, clean and wholesome. Old fashioned housewives always scented their linen and drapery with sprigs of the sweet old flower. Italian orris root and French vetivert, a dried root, may be used as a substitute.

A few Tonka beans broken in halves, put into the drawers and wardrobe where underwear, table and bed linen, gloves, handkerchiefs, etc., are kept, will impart to these articles a most delicate odor which will be extremely agreeable. Jewel boxes and other receptacles may also be scented with them. They are easily obtained of druggists.

The Grecian coiffure, so becoming to many, is not suited to the woman with long features or a tip tilted nose. The arrangement is usually most effective when the hair is drawn straight back from the forehead, banded closely at the front, and a few bangs are curled over the forehead to soften the facial outlines. Wave the hair slightly and gather it loosely in the Psyche knot at the back exactly opposite the tip of the nose, but not above nor below.

If Furniture Could Talk.

If furniture could only talk there would be a sorry time for some housekeepers.

Why are there so many homes which make us feel as if we would like to make quick exit from them, as the conglomerated mixture of carpets, furniture and pictures give an actual pain to contemplate and we sit in silent amazement at such atrocious taste.

"It is easy enough," say some people, "to have artistic surroundings if you have the money to pay for them." In a certain sense this is true, but a full purse does not always guarantee good taste, which is in fact nothing more than having a well developed sense of the suitability of things in connection with each other.

A piece of furniture in itself may be charming, but in the room in which you have to place it it can be a positive fright. To buy such a piece just because you have taken a fancy to it is very foolish, just as foolish as for a man to marry a woman for her good looks, with no regard to other qualities she may or may not possess. Not only must you live with that purchase, but so must everything else in the room, regardless of whether they harmonize or not.

The secret of good furnishing is not only the question, "Do I like it?" but "Will it agree or harmonize with the rest of the furniture where it is to be placed?"

Riddles.

A word of one syllable, easy and short,
Reads backward and forward the same.
It expresses the sentiments warm from the heart
And to beauty lays principal claim.
(Eye.)

What is it that is so dangerous that all people fear it, but which a woman proudly wears about her neck with comfort? (Bon.)

THE CAPTAIN OF the KANSAS

By LOUIS TRACY,

Author of "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," Etc.

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY EDWARD J. CLODE

In this story of danger and hardship, cheerfully borne and courageously met by the brave captain of the Kansas and the sweetheart whose love lightened his burdens when his vessel picked out a path for herself through the perilous reefs of the South American coast, the author of "The Wings of the Morning" and "The Pillar of Light" justifies his reputation as a writer of absorbingly interesting tales of love and adventure. The brave navigator and his sweetheart learned the stern meaning of hardship and danger on the Kansas. In the end, however, with the telegraph lever set for "full speed ahead," the ship sailed out of the difficulties which storm and rocky coast and savage man had set in her path.

CHAPTER I.

"I THINK I shall enjoy this trip," purred Isobel Baring, nestling comfortably among the cushions of her deck chair. A steward was arranging tea for two at a small table. The Kansas, with placid hum of engines, was speeding evenly through an azure sea.

"I agree with that opinion most heartily, though, to be sure, so much depends on the weather," replied her friend, Elsie Maxwell, rising to pour out the tea. Already the brisk sea breeze had kissed the Chileau pallor from Elsie's face, which had regained its English peach bloom. Isobel Baring's complexion was tinged with the warmth of a pomegranate. At sea, even in the blue Pacific, she carried with her the suggestion of a tropical garden.

"I never gave a thought to the weather," purred Isobel again as she subsided more deeply into the cushions.

"Let us hope such a blissful state of mind may be justified. But you know, dear, we may run into a dreadful gale before we reach the strait."

Isobel laughed.

"All the better!" she cried. "People tell me I am a most fascinating invalid. I look like a creamy orchid. And what luck to have a chum so disinterested as you where a lot of nice men are concerned! What have I done to deserve it? Because you are really charming, you know."

"Does that mean that you have already discovered a lot of nice men on board?"

Elsie handed her friend a cup of tea and a plate of toast.

"Naturally. While you were mooning over the lights and tints of the Andes I kept an eye—both eyes, in fact—on our compulsory acquaintances of the next three weeks. To begin with, there's the captain."

"He is good looking, certainly. Somewhat reserved, I fancied."

"Reserved!" Isobel showed all her fine teeth in a smile. Incidentally she took a satisfactory bite out of a square of toast. "I'll soon shake the reserve out of him. He is mine. You will see him play pet dog long before we meet that terrible gale of yours."

"Isobel, you promised your father"—

"To look after my health during the voyage. Do you think I intend only to sleep, eat and read novels all the way to London? Then indeed I should be ill. But there is a French count on the ship. He is mine too."

"You mean to find safety in numbers?"

"Oh, there are others. Of course I am sure of my little count. He twisted his mustache with such an air when I skidded past him in the companionway I am sure M. le Comte Edouard de Polnellit will do our French far more good than a course in Moliere."

"Am I to be included in the lessons? And you actually know the man's name already?"

"Read it on his luggage, dear girl. He has such a lot. See if he doesn't wear three different colored shirts for breakfast, lunch and tea. And, if you refuse to help, who is to take care of le p'tit Edouard while I give the captain a trot round? Don't look cross; there's a darling!"

"Now, Isobel, that does not matter a bit in Valparaiso, where you are known, but in Paris and London"—

"Where I mean to be equally well known. It is a passport to smart society to be a trifle risque. Steward, give my compliments to Captain Courtenay and say that Miss Maxwell and Miss Baring hope he will favor them with his company to tea."

Elsie's bright, eager face flushed slightly. She leaned forward, with a certain squaring of the shoulders, being a determined young person in some respects.

"For once I shall let you off," she said in a low voice. "So I give you fair warning, Isobel—I must not be included in impromptu invitations of that kind."

"Good gracious! I only meant to be polite. Tut, tut, as dad says when he can't swear before ladies. I shan't make the running for you any more."

Elsie drummed an impatient foot on the deck. There was a little pause. Isobel closed her eyes lazily, but she opened them again when she heard her friend say:

"I am sorry if I seem crotchety, dear. Indeed, it is no pretense on my part. You cannot imagine how that man Ventana persecuted me. The mere suggestion of any one's paying me compliments and trying to be fascinating is so repellent that I cringe at the thought."

Isobel Baring raised her head from the cushions.

"Ventana was a determined wooer, then? What did he do?" she asked.

"He—he—pestered me with his attentions. Oh, I should have liked to flog him with a whip!"

"He was always that sort of person—too serious." And the head dropped again.

The steward returned. He was a half caste. His English was to the point.

"De capt'in say he busy, be no come," was his message.

Elsie's display of irritation vanished in a merry laugh. Isobel bounced up from the depths of the chair. Her dark eyes blazed wrathfully.

"Tell him"— she began.

Then she mastered her annoyance sufficiently to ascertain what it was that Captain Courtenay had actually said, and she received a courteous explanation in Spanish that the commander could not leave the chart house until the Kansas had rounded the low lying, red hued Cape Caramolla, which still barred the ship's path to the south, the first stage of the long voyage from Valparaiso to London.

But pertinacity was a marked trait of the Baring family. Otherwise Isobel's father, a bluff, churchwarden type of man, would not have won his way to the chief place in the firm of Baring, Thompson, Miguel & Co., mining and export agents, the leading house in Chile's principal port. Notwithstanding Elsie's previous outburst the steward was sent back to ask if the ladies might visit the bridge later. Meanwhile would Captain Courtenay like a cup of tea? All things considered, there was only one possible answer. Captain Courtenay would be charmed if they favored him with both the tea and their company.

"I thought so," cried Isobel triumphantly. "Come on, Elsie! Let us climb the ladder of conquest. The steward will bring the tea things. The chart house is just splendid. It will provide a refuge when the count becomes too pressing."

Captain Courtenay.

There was a tightening of Elsie's lips to which Isobel paid no heed. The imminent protest was left unspoken, for Courtenay's voice came to them:

"Please hold on by the rail. If a foot were to slip on one of those brass treads the remainder of the day would be a compound of tears and sticking plaster."

Gathering her skirts daintily in her left hand, Isobel tripped up the steep stairs. Elsie followed. Courtenay, who had the manner and semblance of the first lieutenant of a warship, stood outside a haven of plate glass, shining mahogany and white paint. The woodwork of the deck was scrubbed until it had the color of new bread. An officer paced the bridge. A sailor with in the chart house held the small wheel of the steam steering gear. Somewhat to Isobel's surprise neither man seemed to be aware of her presence.

"So this is your den?" she said, throwing her birdlike glance over the bright interior before she gave the commander a look which was designed to bewitch him instantly. "Surely you don't sleep here too?"

"Oh, no! This room is the brain of the ship, Miss Baring. We are always wide awake here. My quarters are farther aft. I think I can find a chair for you if you care to sit down while I have my tea."

The captain led the way to a spacious cabin behind the chart house.

"I hope you don't mind the chairs being secured to the deck," he said, taking off his hat. "So far, above sea line, you know, everything that is loose comes to grief when the ship rolls."

"Then what becomes of your photographs?" demanded Isobel promptly, her quick eyes having discovered the pictures of two ladies in silver frames on a writing table.

"I take care to put them away. There is always plenty of warning. No ordinary sea can trouble a big hulk like the Kansas."

"Is that your mother, the dear old lady in the lace cap?"

"Yes, and the other is my sister."

"Oh, really! Is she married?"

"No. Like me, she is wedded to her profession."

"Will you think it rude if I ask what that is?"

"She is a hospital nurse—the matron, indeed, of a public institution in the suburbs of London."

Isobel filled a cup of tea, asked if Captain Courtenay took milk and sugar and said demurely, with a sip of a spoonful:

"Let me see if I can guess your tastes."

Elsie's blue eyes assumed a deeper shade. Men might like that kind of thing, but she felt that her face and neck would be poppy red in another moment. Thus far she had not addressed a word to Courtenay, though by his manner he had included her in the conversation. She now resolved to break in on the attack which Isobel was beginning with the adroitness of a skilled campaigner. And she, too, could use her eyes to advantage when she chose.

"What a curious library you have, Captain Courtenay," she said, looking not at him, but at a row of books fitting closely into a small case over the writing table—"Shakespeare, the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' Montaigne's essays, Herbert Spencer, 'Goethe's Life,' by Lewes; Marcus Aurelius, Marshall, Wordsworth, 'The Egoist,' Thoreau, Hazlitt and 'Milford's Tales of Old Japan!' Where have I heard or read of that particular galaxy of stars before?"

"Go on. You are on the right track," cried Courtenay, setting down the tea cup and hastening to Elsie's side. She was leaning on the table, reading the titles of the books. The motive of her exclamation was merged now in the true ardor of the book lover. She had an unconscious trick of placing the forefinger of her right hand on her lips when deeply engaged in thought. Elegant as Isobel Baring might be in her studied poses, Elsie need fear no comparison as she examined the contents of the bookcase with eager attention.

"We have actually hit upon a topic that should prove inexhaustible," continued Courtenay. "Believe me, Miss Maxwell, that is my pet subject. More than once, needing a listener, I have even lectured my long suffering terrier, Joey, on the point."

Isobel laughed softly. The two, standing in front of the bookcase, started apart with a sudden consciousness that they were speaking unguardedly, for Isobel's mirth had mockery in it—"there was a laughing devil in her sneer."

"By the way, where is Joey?" she asked.

The dog answered her question by appearing, with a stretch and a yawn, from beneath a locker. He had heard his name in Courtenay's voice. That sufficed for Joey at any time.

"You darling! You must have slept with one eye open," said Elsie, stooping to pat him.

"Oh, take care!" cried Isobel. "He may love you."

"No he! When you see that wistful look in a dog's eyes, have no fear. He wants to speak then. You won't bite me, will you, dear?" And Elsie sank on one knee to stroke Joey's white coat, whereupon Joey tried to lick her face.

"Between the library and the captain's dog you are installed as a prime favorite on board the Kansas," commented Isobel. The other girl rose hurriedly. She had caught the touch of malice in the smooth voice.

"Captain Courtenay is too polite to remind us that we are intruders," she said lightly. "We forget that he is busy. Joey, candidly canine, did not try to hide his feelings."

Isobel swung her chair round to face the door.

"This is quite the best place in the ship," she said. "I am very comfortable, thank you. Please don't send us away, captain."

Before Courtenay could answer the officer of the watch looked in.

"Cape Caramolla bearing sou'west of the Buel rock, sir," he announced and vanished again.

"Don't hurry," said Courtenay, taking up his cap. "I must leave you for a few minutes."

He was gone, with Joey at his heels, and there was a brief silence.

"Really, Isobel, we should go back on deck," urged Elsie uneasily. Already she half regretted the impulse which led her to intervene in her friend's special hobby.

"I like that. I didn't credit you with such guile, Elsie Maxwell. You snap up my nice captain beneath my very nose and coolly propose that I should vacate the battlefield. Oh, dear, no! I can't talk literature, but I can flirt, and I have not finished with Arthur yet by a long chalk."

Isobel leaned back in her chair. She was insolently conscious of her superior attractions. Was she not the richest heiress in Valparaiso? Had not her father chartered this ship? And was not Elsie even now flying from an unwelcome suitor? She knew full well that her friend would resent the slightest semblance of lovemaking on the part of any man on board. Already her astonishment at Elsie's unlooked for vivacity was yielding to the rumor of meeting such a rival. The count might serve as a foil, but the real quarry now was the captain. That very night there would be a moon. And the sea was calm as a sheltered lake.

Suddenly they both heard an excited bark from the dog and the quick rush of feet along the deck. Courtenay's voice recalled them with a new and startling note in it.

"Stop that!" he shouted.

There was an instant's pause. Their alert ears caught the sounds of a distant scuffle. Then a pistol shot jarred the peaceful drone of the ship.

"Sheer off, there!" roared Courtenay again. "Next time I shoot to kill!"

With terror in their eyes, with blanched cheeks, they rushed to the door and peeped out. Courtenay was not to be seen, but the officer of the watch was swinging himself over the canvas shield of the bridge. He disappeared. Joey, barking furiously, trotted into view and ran back again. Creeping forward, they saw the stolid sailor within the chart house squint at the compass and give the wheel a slight turn. That was reassuring. Yet another timorous pace, and through the curving window they could discern Courtenay holding a revolver in his right hand, but behind his back.

Even in their alarm they realized that nothing very terrible would happen now. But why had the shot been fired, and what had given that tense ring to Courtenay's threat?

Venturing a little farther, they gained the bridge. On the main deck, a long way beneath, near an open hatch, a half caste Chilean was lying on his back. He had evidently been wounded. Blood was flowing from his leg. It smeared the white deck. The officer who had climbed down so speedily from the bridge was directing two other men how to lift him. Close by the chief officer, Mr. Boyle, was stanching a deep cut on his chin with a handkerchief. At the same time he curtly ordered off such deck hands and stewards as came running forward, attracted by the disturbance.

The girls were gazing wide eyed at

In the circuit court Thompson won the case but the verdict has now been reversed by the Supreme court. Harris & Ruegsegger of Boyne City are attorneys for the complainants.

Hereafter boats navigating the inland waters of the country must carry lights at both stern and bow, and must be provided with whistles of sufficient power to give signals to other craft. This ruling has recently been adopted by the United States department of marine at Washington, and orders have been sent out to that effect. This will mean a lot of expense to the owners of launches, but the accidents which will be averted by the lights and whistles will more than compensate.

The Central Michigan Fair circuit has been reorganized at Howard City. The associations forming the circuit are Ionia, Greenville, Howard City, Big Rapids and Cadillac. One or more others may join later. As at present scheduled the circuits string of meetings will begin Aug. 31-Sept. 3 at Howard City, followed by Big Rapids, Sept. 7-10; Cadillac, Sept. 14-17; Greenville, Sept. 21-24. While Ionia's date has not been decided definitely it is thought the following week, Sept. 28-Oct. 1, may be selected. Following are the officers:

President, Perry F. Powers, Cadillac; vice president, N. J. Spaulding, Ionia; secretary, J. B. Haskins, Howard City; treasurer, John C. Collins, Howard City; executive committee, Joseph Barton, Big Rapids; W. W. Shawson, Greenville; J. M. Terwilliger, Cadillac; and the other officers ex-officio.

Uniformity of purses and continuous weeks of racing and other attractions will secure for the circuit members many advantages not enjoyed in a "go-it-alone" policy.

George Whiting, who holds an important educational position in the Phillippine Islands, some years ago visited the Beulah Home for Boys at Boyne City. Later he secured permission from the Phillippine government to establish a similar institution there, adopting the plan of self-government for the boys who were students. The proposition has been very successful, and he now has authority to start a second similar institution on a larger scale, with 1700 acres of land as a site. Mr. Whiting visited relatives in Boyne City last week. He has been ten years in the islands, going there as an enlisted man in the army.

The Tindle & Jackson railroad promises to be a busy institution this season. Besides the regular work of the company, the Cadillac Handle Co. will put in a track in their timber, also an engine and crews, camps, etc. A telephone system will at once be constructed along the right of way and will connect with the several camps. The operating of the road has become quite a factor of the business and G. H. Allison, an experienced railroad man, has been secured to assist in the management of this department.—Pellston Journal.

William Gingriche's saw mill at Douglas lake caught fire Sunday morning of last week and burned to the ground with all of its contents. Nothing was saved. The many fire fighters gathering at the scene devoted their whole attention to saving the lumber and logs around the mill, and in this were successful. The loss will be about $1,000, and not a cents worth of insurance was carried by Mr. Gingrich, as he was unable to get the mill insured because of some dangerous devises that he was unable to remedy at the time.

Literary Notes

Empress Eugenie's Wedding Day.

Even on her wedding day, the Empress Eugene received a sign of ill omen, according to Clara Morris in the Woman's Home Companion for May. The market women of Paris presented her with a mountain of violets on the day of her marriage to Louis Napoleon. Miss Morris says:

"And those market women—they boiled over! They yelled and pushed and crowded into the palace gardens. They screeched and screamed for the Empress, until at last a window opened and Eugenie stepped out on the balcony, and ever eager to please, she held in her hands a great mass of the violets the market women had sent her.

"Then suddenly one old fish wife shrieked out at those of the committee, 'Pigs! Idiots! It is the flower of sorrow you have sent her!' While quick another raved out, 'It is the color of mourning that you send the bride of the Emperor! Violets purple violets to a bride! Pigs! Idiots! Devils!' It is an omen—a sign of evil!"

"And then, the fight began! Oh, mon Dieu! They are terrible! They tear one another like beasts! The gendarmes try hard to make order, when a voice up above us say out clear and gentle, 'Oh, soldiers, don't hurt them!' And the idea that any soldier on earth could hurt a dame des Halles was so funny that everybody stopped fighting to laugh. And they laugh and laugh, and wipe off the blood, and slap the gendarmes and say, 'Don't hurt us, messieurs—don't!' And they dance and shout, and the beautiful Empress stand now by the Emperor, and bow, and throw violets to the crowd, and all below cry 'Vive l'Imperatrice!' And she smile and smile, and so retire. But that old witch was right! Yes, madame, though the violet was the flower of the Bonaparte, it is the flower of sorrow, not fit to send a bride! It was an omen, and given at the Tuileries, it pointed to Chiselhurst!"

COUNTY NORMAL NOTES.

Maud Cross, Hazel Holliday, Cecile Barkley and Margaret Ryan began their practice teaching in the training room under Miss Reed's instruction. Maud Cross has charge of the sixth grade arithmetic; Hazel Holliday has charge of the first grade reading; Margaret Ryan and Cecile Barkley are doing work with the fourth grade geography class.

The normal class began work in elementary agriculture and civics.

Little Sister Was Grateful.

Little Gladys, aged four, was being taught to express thanks when the occasion demanded. When she did not do so some member of the family would ask: "What do you say, Gladys?" which would bring forth the desired result. One evening Gladys and the young man who is to marry her sister were in the parlor. "Well, Gladys," said the young man, "I guess I'll marry Bertie and take her away. What do you say?"

"Thank you," replied the little girl politely.—Delineator.

The Purple Comet.

By CLARISSA MACKIE.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

Mrs. Osmond emerged from the milliner's abstractedly buttoning her glove. She crossed the pavement and entered a small electric brougham which was waiting at the curb.

"Home," she said to the chauffeur as he closed the door.

In an instant they were gliding up the avenue. As they threaded the maze of vehicles crowding its length Alicia Osmond leaned against the cushions and closed her aching eyes.

The glare and bustle of the busy streets had tired her already overstrung nerves. She felt a sense of grateful relief when they entered the quieter uptown district.

The gentle motion of the car lulled her into somnolence. She must have dozed. When she finally realized it was to glance from the window with a little exclamation. They had left the city streets and were in the open country. The car bowled along the old post road, with occasional glimpses of the blue waters of the sea between the bare branches of the trees.

A glance at the leather cased clock added to her astonishment. The hands pointed to 1 o'clock. It had been 11 when she entered the brougham.

She signaled to the chauffeur. To her amazement he did not respond. His great square back partially blocked the window. The collar of his coat was turned up about his ears and his cap, pulled well down on his head. With gauntleted hands grasping the steering wheel and eyes set straight in front, the man seemed oblivious to his surroundings.

Alicia Osmond was thoroughly frightened. Could it be possible that her chauffeur had suddenly been bereft of reason and that he was carrying her no one knew whither? She leaned forward and rapped desperately on the plate glass with her silver portemonnaie.

"Stevens!" she called sharply. The only response was the increased speed of the car. She called again and again, but received no reply. At last she sank back on the seat with real alarm.

After awhile she calmed herself and looked eagerly from the window. Help might be obtained in their swift passage through the towns, but their speed was so great that the people they met flashed by like specters, while trees and dwellings were blurred panoramas.

She recognized the country now—they were near Fernecliff. Her lips quivered, and the slow tears rolled down her cheeks. Fernecliff had been her home and Norman's ever since their marriage, but since their serious quarrel and the quiet separation which had followed she had taken the town house, and Norman had disappeared quietly from his accustomed haunts—gone to Europe, said the gossips.

The sight of the familiar country gave her a sharp pang that made her forget her anxiety over her strange predicament of the moment. A hot sense of grief overwhelmed her again, as it had overwhelmed her many, many times in these past sad weeks. As soon as her first unreasonable anger had vanished she had known poignantly that her quarrel with her husband had been a mistake. She felt with bitter woe and passionate self reproach that she loved him—loved him more than all the world.

The brougham whizzed on desperately, but she did not notice it. She was sobbing clumsily and calling for him who was far away. How good Norman had always been to her! Everything she had wished for had been hers. The automobile in which she rode had been his last present to her.

"The Purple Comet, darling," he had announced, laughing his great, boyish laugh as he indicated the car with a sweep of his hand. The thought brought her back with a start to her situation.

At the instant it dawned on her that there was something unfamiliar about the car. There were the fittings of cream leather and purple velvet but the clock! The gold monogram beneath its enameled face bore the initials "B. C." instead of "A. L. O."

In place of the purple velvet cushions on which her feet were wont to rest there was a white fur rug.

The machine was not the Purple Comet!

It was so like her own that she could see how she had made a mistake. But where was the strange chauffeur taking her?

She glanced from the window and uttered an almost hysterical cry. They had turned into the elm avenue which led to Fernecliff, and now the long, low front of the closely shuttered house confronted her.

They drew up under the wide porte cochere, and she saw the grave face of old Angus, the butler, peering down from the gloom of the doorway. With a little sob she alighted and was standing beside Angus before the chauffeur descended from his seat.

Alicia was frightened and bewildered. In her agitation she could think of nothing. The old butler greeted her with a puzzled glance, stepped aside, bowing low, and she entered the door and walked into the library.

"Mr. Osmond is not at home, is he?" she asked, with a frightened look at the old servitor.

"No, madam."

"But you are keeping the house open?" she asked, wondering meantime how she could explain her arrival.

"Mr. Osmond," replied the butler, "ordered us to keep the house in readiness. He thought he might be home any time, I suppose."

Alicia's eyes were bright with tears. "That is all. You may go now, Angus," she said kindly.

When she was alone she laid her head on the broad arm of the huge leather covered chair beside her own. It had been Norman's favorite seat, and the very touch of it seemed to bring him nearer to her. She was crying again when the soft closing of the door caused her to lift her head.

She sprang to her feet and confronted the muffled figure of the chauffeur who had so strangely driven her down to Fernecliff.

Before she could dash away her tears the man had removed his cap and goggles and flung aside his coat. She saw before her the haggard face and miserable eyes of her husband.

"Norman!" she whispered faintly. "You?"

"I want you," he said deliberately, standing with tightly folded arms. "I want you, Alicia. I cannot live without you. You belong to me."

"I am so glad," she breathed softly. "I have wanted you, Norman, it has been such a horrible mistake all around, and I have been so unhappy."

"So have I," he said briefly as he took her in his arms. "The next time we disagree over any matter it will be a case for arbitration eh, darling? Not the bitter punishment of separation."

When Alicia had sobbed herself into peace she asked for an explanation. "Where did you come from, and where is the Purple Comet? And everything is so mixed up today."

"I have been watching and waiting," said Norman, blushing a little. "I felt sure, darling, that you did not hate me. This morning I drove Barbara to town in her new purple car—the one outside, a duplicate of the Purple Comet. When you came out of the shop your own man had gone around the block. You walked deliberately into the Chapin's machine, and I couldn't resist the temptation to run away with you."

"And Barbara Chapin—what will she think about her car?" asked Alicia wonderingly.

"She is probably still trying on bonnets, or perhaps she has annexed the Purple Comet and gone home."

"Norman Osmond, did you bribe Stevens to drive around the block?" demanded Alicia, looking into her husband's happy eyes.

Osmond laughed happily. "I will confess that the Immaculate Stevens is not above corruption," he admitted.

"You will stay with me, Alicia?" he asked again after a long while.

"Dear, I never want to go away. I would rather be with you than anywhere else in the world," she said brokenly.

"Then it will be all right with us after this," he said. "Let us light a hearth fire, Alicia. We must never let it go out again."

What Might Happen.

Lord Blessington, the husband of the celebrated Countess of Blessington, had a horror of a draft. He was able, Count d'Orsay used to declare, to detect a current of air caused by the key being left crossways in the keyhole of the door. He and his wife and a youth were one day walking on the banks of the Thames. The boy, skipping backward and forward, went several times dangerously close to the edge of the bank.

"Take care! Take care!" cried Lord Blessington, exhibiting a degree of solicitude most unusual where another person was concerned. "For heaven's sake, mind what you are about, boy, or you'll certainly fall into the river!"

After two or three repetitions of his alarm in this fashion for the lad, Lady Blessington, losing patience, said: "Oh, let the boy alone! If he does fall into the water, he swims like a fish."

"Yes, yes," said his lordship in injured tones, "that's all very well, but what about me? I shall catch my death of cold driving home in the carriage with him!"

Kept Its Promise.

Chaffer—Since I've had my auto I've paid over a thousand dollars in fines.

Seawicker—Well, didn't the ageal tell you it was a time bar?—Lippincott's Magazine.

"Well, well," said the absentminded professor as he stood knee deep in the bathtub, "what on earth did I get in here for?"

Callers at the White House in the interest of jobs for their friends were very frequent in the strenuous days of Lincoln's presidency. At one time a party called on Lincoln and requested a position for a friend on the ground that his health would be benefited by his being consul at a certain place.

The interview was cut short, however, by these words of Lincoln:

"Gentlemen, I am very sorry to say that there are ten other applicants for this position of consul. I am still more sorry to say that all of these applicants are sicker than your client."

this somewhat nanervfag scene when Courtenay approached.

"Better go below," he said quietly. "I am sorry this trouble should have happened, at the beginning of the voyage too. I hope it will not upset you. That rascally Chilean tried to knife Mr. Boyle, and those other blackguards were ready to side with him. I had to shoot quick and straight to show them I meant what I said."

"Is he dead?" asked Isobel, with a contemptuous coolness as to the fate of the mutineer which Courtenay found admirable.

"Not a bit of it. Fired at his legs Only a flesh wound, I fancy."

"Poor wretch!" murmured Elsie "Was there no other way?"

"There is only one way of dealing with that sort of skunk," was the gruff answer. The pity in her voice implied a condemnation of his act He resented it, and so it came to pass that neither the library nor the room had power to draw the captain of the Kansas to the promenade deck that night.

CHAPTER II.

DR. CHRISTOBAL brought some additional details to the dinner table. He was not the ship's doctor. The Kansas, built for freight rather than passengers, did not carry a surgeon on her roll. Dr. Christobal's presence was due to Mr. Baring's solicitude in his daughter's behalf. It chanced that the courtly and gray haired Spanish physician had relinquished his practice in Chile and was about to pay a long promised visit to a married daughter in Barcelona. Friendship, not unaided by a good fee, induced him to travel by the Kansas.

He had been called on to attend Mr. Boyle and the wounded Chilean, and he reported now that the chief officer's injury was trifling, but the Chilean's wound might incapacitate him during the remainder of the voyage.

"So far as I can gather," he said, "Mr. Boyle had a narrow escape. Captain Courtenay fired as the knife fell; otherwise our first mate would have attended his own funeral this evening."

"What was the cause of the affair?" Isobel asked.

"The man is not one of the ship's crew, I understand. His name is Frasenelo, and it appears that he was engaged to place some bunker coal aboard early this morning. He says that he was dragged and his clothes stolen, that he came off to the ship at a late hour and that some one flung him headlong into a hold which, luckily for him, was nearly full of cotton bales. He was stunned by the fall, and were it not for Captain Courtenay's custom of having all hatches taken off and a thorough examination of the cargo made before the holds are finally battened down for the voyage Frasenelo might now be in a tight place in more than one sense."

Dr. Christobal was proud of his idiomatic English. He spoke the language with the careless freedom of a Londoner.

"Frasenelo seems to have passed an eventful day," said the little French count, who had been waiting anxiously for a chance to join in the conversation.

"But why should he want to kill poor Mr. Boyle?" inquired Isobel after giving the Frenchman an encouraging glance. Incidentally she smiled at Elsie. "Why puzzle one's brains over foreign tongues when all the world speaks English?" she telegraphed.

"Mr Boyle is a peculiar person," said the doctor dryly. "I happen to have known him during some years. You and I might regard him as a man of few words, but he has acquired a wonderful vocabulary for the benefit of sailor men. I believe he can swear in every known lingo. His accomplishment in that direction no doubt annoyed Frasenelo, who became frantic when he heard that the ship would not call at any South American port. I imagine, too, that the unfortunate fellow is still suffering from the drug which, he says, was administered to him. Anyhow, you know how the affair terminated."

"I, for one, think some consideration might have been shown him," said Elsie.

"There is no time for argument when a Chilean draws a knife, Miss Maxwell."

"But if his story is true"—

"There never yet was a stowaway who did not invent a plausible yarn. Nevertheless I believe, and Mr. Boyle agrees with me, that the man is not lying."

They felt the ship swing around on a new course, and the rays of the setting sun lit up the salon table through the open starboard ports.

"Due south now, ladies!" cried Dr. Christobal cheerily. "We have rounded Cape Cardones. We practically follow the seventy-sixth degree until we approach Evangelistas Island. Thus far we are in the open sea.—Then we pick our way through the strait discovered by that daring Portuguese, Fernando de Magallanes. If I am not mistaken," he added, glancing through the port windows, "we shall all have our stamina tested before twenty-four hours have passed."

Heads were turned and necks craned to see what had induced this unexpected prophecy. Behind the illustrious coast line the inner ghants of the Andes threw heavenward their rugged outlines, with many a peak and glacier glinting in vivid colors against a sky so clear and blue that they seemed strangely near.

"Yes, this wonderful atmosphere of ours is enchanting," said the doctor when assailed by a chorus of doubts. "But it carries its deceptive smiles too far. The very beauty of the cordillera is a sign of storm. I am sorry to be a croaker, yet we are running into a gale."

"I shall ask the captain," protested Isobel, rising.

The count twisted his mustache. He knew that both ladies were in the forbidden territory of the bridge when the frauds occurred.

"You perhaps are a good sailor," said he, addressing Elsie.

"I am afraid to boast," she answered. "I have been in what was called a No. 8 gale, whatever that may mean, and weathered it splendidly, but I am older now."

"It cannot have been long ago, seeing that you recall it so exactly."

"It was six years ago, and I was seventeen then," said Elsie, her eyes wandering to the purple and gold of the far off mountains.

"But you are English. You are therefore at home on the rolling deep," murmured M. de Tolmiac confidentially. She did not endeavor to interpret his expressive glance, though he seemed to convey more than he said.—

"Not so much at home at sea as you are in my language," she replied, and she turned to Dr. Christobal, whom she had already known slightly in Valparaiso.

"Are you coming on deck?" she inquired. "I am sure you are a mine of information on Chile, and I want to extract some of the ore while the land is still visible. It is already assuming the semblance of a dream."

"You are not saying a last farewell to Valparaiso, I hope," said her elderly companion as they quitted the salon.

"I think so. I have no ties there save those of sentiment. I shall not return unless, if a doubtful fortune permits, I am able some day to revisit two graves which are dear to me."

There was a little catch in her voice and the doctor was far too sympathetic to endeavor forthwith to divert her sad thoughts.

—"I knew your father," he said gently. "He was a most admirable man, but quite unsuited to the environment of a new country, where the dollar is god, and an unstable deity at that. He was swindled outrageously by men who stand high in the community today. But you, Miss Maxwell, with your knowledge of Spanish and your other acquirements, should do better here than in Europe, provided, that is, you mean to earn your own living."

"I am proud to hear you speak well of my father," she said. "And I am well aware that he was badly treated in business. I fear, too, that his advocacy of the rights of the Indians brought him into disfavor. Of all his possessions the only remnant left to me is a barren mountain, with a slice of fertile valley, in the Quillota district. It yields me the magnificent revenue of $200 per annum."

"How in the world did he come to own land there?"

"It was a gift from the Naquilla tribe. He defeated an attempt made to oust them by a big land company. The company has since asked me to sell the property and offered me a fair price, too, as the cultivable land is a very small strip, but it would be almost like betraying the cause for which he fought, would it not?"

"Yes, indeed,"—agreed the doctor, though his heart and not his head dictated the reply. "May I ask you to tell me your plans for the future?" he went on.

"Well, when Mr. Baring heard I was going to England he was good enough to promise me employment in his London agency as Spanish correspondent. That will fill in two days a week. The rest I can devote to art. I paint a little and draw with sufficient promise to warrant study, I am told. Anyhow, I am weary of teaching. I prefer to be a pupil."

"I cannot imagine what the young men of Valparaiso were thinking of to allow a girl like you to slip off in this fashion," said Christobal, with a smile.

"Most of them hold firmly to the belief that a wife's wedding dress should be made of gilt edged scrip."

"Poor material—very poor material out of which to construct wedded happiness. And as to my young friend, Isobel—she joins her aunt in London, I hear?"

"That is the present arrangement. She means to have a good time, especially in Paris. I should like to live in Paris myself. Dear old smoke laden London does not appeal so thoroughly to the artist. Yet I am content—yes, quite content."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The Salt Sea Legend.

There is a legend in the Norse sealds which explains why the sea is salt. The "bountiful Frodi," whose mythical reign was a golden age indeed, possessed a quern, or hand mill, which ground out gold and peace, but which would grind out stores of anything desired by its owner. Two giant maideas, ruled over by Frodi, were the grinders. In an evil day a sea rover came upon the scene, slew Frodi and carried off the quern and the two giant maidens who worked it. When the sea rover's vessel was right out at sea he ordered the maidens to grind salt. At midnight they asked if they had not ground enough. The sea rover, angry at being awakened from his sleep, commanded them to grind until morning. Now, the giant maidens naturally enough worked very quickly, so as they went on grinding the load of salt grew so heavy that it sank the ship, and now the sea will continue salt forever.

FEEDING THE STALLION.

A well known breeder of thoroughbreds says of feeding stallions:

"Much space in papers and books has been devoted to treatises on how to feed stallions, and some weird and wonderful fancies have darkened the pages of good white paper concerning this subject. Some very wise ideas have also gained wide publicity by the same means, but they may all be reduced to a very few simple maxims. Stallions are horses and require horse food; also with horses, as with men, one's food is another's poison, and the idea of prescribing so many oats, corn and so much hay and some of the 'trimmings' isn fond to the heart of the office theorist as the only way to feed any stallion and the way to feed all stallions is so patently ridiculous as not to require extended comment. But there is one thing which most stallions do lack and which is of the greatest value, grass.

"To eat green grass, growing, is of the very greatest value to all horses and to none more than the sires. Many owners are satisfied on this subject if the grass is cut and fed to the horse in the stall; but, while so fed it is not entirely valueless, it misses many of the most important objects to be attained. The eating of the grass, getting the head down, having the processes of mastication retarded by the wandering about in search of the choicest morsels and the operation of nipping them off is part of nature's plan for making the larger quantities of food a horse will eat accommodate itself to the relatively small receptacle that constitutes the animal's stomach. Some owners go to the other extreme and reverse nature's process by putting the feed box and hayrack as high up as the horse can possibly eat from them, the idea being presumably to stretch his neck in the other direction as much as may be.

"Many other things enter into the proper feeding of stallions, and the horse is always a better judge than the man, and each horse must be treated according to his own individual idiosyncrasies. If you have ever 'grassed' a stallion you cannot have failed to remark how his judgment will differ from yours. You will notice a particularly inviting plot of luxuriant herbage and lead the horse thereto only to find him tugging at the halter strap in an effort to wander on to another spot where he will graze greedily upon what to your eye is much less edible growthage.

"And how often you find your horse burying his teeth in the pure black earth, eating the dirt with a greediness and evident relish that are highly significant and suggestive.

"Many horses are as nothing about their meals as are their owners, and you can no more feed a stallion by rule of three than you can a man. And the horse will indicate to you whether or not you are attending to your duties as chef and purveyor properly in no uncertain manner. The trouble with too many owners is that they want to constitute themselves the judge of what the horse should eat rather than permit the horse to show them what he likes and wants and then providing it for him. Many horses do not like to eat corn on the cob, but if the owner for any reason thinks corn is the proper ration the horse will be offered corn and may take it or leave it. Some horses will eat what they don't like rather than starve.

"Try all possible ways of determining what the horse wants. Notice what he goes for avidly and 'cleans up' to the point of licking the bottom of the box for more and feed him those things until he begins to show signs that he wants a change. The horse knows what he likes better than you do, and what he likes will be good for him. Horses have much better sense than people.

"Exercise and feed are two important matters, but are far from exhausting the subject. One thing that owners, particularly of small farms, often overlook is that stallions like company, and many a good breeding horse has suffered great deterioration from loneliness. Horses exhibit no feeling more plainly at times than homesickness and the desire for companionship with their kind.

"Stallions ought not to be babied and pampered. Nothing is better for them than the gospel of hard work. And they should never be subjected to very material changes. Their work should be about the same all the year around, and if changes are made they should be introduced very steadily."

THE DAIRYMAN.

A careful milker, quiet in his ways about the stable, is worth many dollars more in a single season than one who is brutal. There is not a cow, no matter how poorly bred, that will not respond to kind treatment.

Stick to One Breed.

Stick to one breed, says the Wisconsin Agriculturist. It is folly to be changing breeds continually or grading up a herd. No progress can be made and only an incongruous mixture can result from such a practice. When you have started to grade up to one breed stick to that and use the best you can get in it to accomplish the grading up process.

Cleanliness a Safeguard.

Cleanliness about the cows, the stable, clothes of the milkers and all utensils cannot be too carefully looked after. Milk is a product that is consumed raw. For this reason dirt becomes dangerous. Dirt may not be pleasant to think of in a food product when cooked, but you do not feel that you are taking the same risk in regard to health.

Sand For Bedding.

Those who have used sand for bedding for cows are pleased with it. Sand is warm, easy to lie upon and prevents the cow from slipping when reaching her food. It is an excellent absorbent of liquids, easily shoveled in and out, a superior divisor of droppings and is an excellent substance to apply to cold lands.

Tuberculosis In Calves.

Through the use of a cow with a tuberculous udder it was found that calves taking milk from such cows contract tuberculosis with great rapidity. One calf that took the milk of the cow for several months was affected with generalized tuberculosis at the age of five months, and four calves, of which three sucked the milk from the cow's udder respectively one, three and seven days and one which was fed the milk from a pail thirty days, also contracted tuberculosis.

To Prevent Milk Fever.

Cows that are to calve in winter or early spring should have about six quarts of some vegetable every day for two weeks before calving. If this course is pursued there will be no milk fever or any of the other many troubles incident to calving time.

Molasses Fed to Stock.

In France and Germany molasses is fed to horses and cattle with excellent results. It is served out to them at midday and in the evening. After they have eaten three-fourths of the dry fodder, molasses thinned with water is poured over the remainder, and the animals eat the fodder ravenously and lick their mangers clean. In commencing the use of molasses from one to one and a half pounds per head is given at first and after about three weeks the quantity gradually increased to three pounds. For cattle, after they have become used to the ration, the farmer takes the molasses just as it comes from the factory.

UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS

"The Publishers of Webster's International Dictionary allege that it "is, in fact, the popular Unabridged thoroughly re-edited in every detail, and vastly enriched in every part, with the purpose of adapting it to meet the larger and severer requirements of another generation."

We are of the opinion that this allegation most clearly and accurately describes the work that has been accomplished and the result that has been reached. The Dictionary, as it now stands, has been thoroughly revised in every detail, has been corrected in every part, and is admirably adapted to meet the larger and severer requirements of a generation which demands more of popular philological knowledge than any generation that the world has ever contained.

It is perhaps needless to add that we refer to the dictionary in our judicial work as of the highest authority in accuracy of definition; and that in the future as in the past it will be the source of constant reference.

KILLED BY RAILROADS

Tables Showing Number of Accidents in Michigan in 1908.

Railroad Commissioner Dickerson of the Michigan railroad commission has prepared an interesting table showing the injuries and deaths on Michigan railroads for the year 1908. It shows that during the year there were 1,414 passengers injured. Included in this are the large number who suffered just minor injuries. There were 777 employes hurt, 145 trespassers injured and 453 other persons suffered accidents.

During the year, 52 passengers were killed, 88 employes met death through accidents, 177 trespassers were killed and 73 other persons not enumerated in these classes, but struck at crossings, etc., were also killed.

The Detroit United helped the list with 53 killed. It injured 875 passengers, 89 employes, 9 trespassers and 321 others. The Michigan United total casualties were 156, of which 18 were trespassers. Of steam railroads the Pere Marquette had 38 killed, of whom 25 were trespassers, and 389 injured. The Michigan Central had 70 killed, 40 of whom were trespassers, and 197 injured. The Lake Shore had 18 killed, 12 being trespassers, and 110 injured.

The Grand Trunk, 37 killed, 27 being trespassers, and 68 injured. The Ann Arbor, 17 killed, six being trespassers, and 45 injured. Wabash, 19 killed, nine being trespassers, and 85 injured.

Several decades ago there lived in Charleston, W. Va., a judge noted for his boorish manners. A very dulcal lawyer whom he especially disliked was once trying a case before him, and all the while the barrister spoke the judge sat with his feet elevated on the railing in front of him hiding his face.

Exasperated by this, the lawyer queried:

"May I ask which end of your honor I am to address?"

"Whichever you choose," drawled the judge.

"Well," was the retort, "I suppose there is as much law in one end as the other."

THEATRICAL

Montana.

An event of much interest to theatre goers is the forthcoming engagement of Henry D. Carey's successful American play, "Montana" at the Charlevoix Theatre on Friday April 30.

The author of other plays of ingeninus plot and finished workmanship, it remained for "Montana" to secure for Mr. Carey his most emphatic triumph. With an original plot, developed with remarkable adroitness, creating an intense and anxious suspense that is maintained unbroken until the very last scene and disclosing a comprehensive and intimate knowledge of the human heart, "Montana" ranks with the best of the few good plays of western life.

Mr. Carey has handled his subject in such a bold vigorous style and his thorough knowledge of the west and its people has given his play the strength and true atmosphere, so often lacking in plays of the west. He has imparted the breezy swinging air of the prairie into his characters and at the same time given them the ruggedness and strength of the mountains.

"Montana" abounds in bright clever comedy, and the heart story is one that appeals to the finer sensibilities. The management has paid special attention to the mounting of the play, all special scenery being provided. The cast has been carefully selected and is evenly balanced and capable. While there are many thrilling and exciting scenes and incidents during the action of the play, "Montana" must not be confused with the many so called western plays, whose greatest claim of merit is the display and use of the six shooter and Bowie knife. "Montana" is a consistent human story of real men and women of the west in their true environment.

Genuine Authorized Version.

A special revival of the "Two Orphans" will be seen here May 5, under the direction of Fred G. Conrad with a carefully chosen company of tried actors thoroughly experienced in the great roles of this famous play. The genuine authorized Kate Claxton version will be used, it being the only one that gives a complete idea of the full power of this drama. A complete equipment of splendid scenery has been supplied which will permit the entire production in its original strength to be given. The management through its agreement with Miss Claxton, has secured great benefit of her many years of experience in the part of the blind girl, Louise, and therefore it will be played just as it used to be in detail. In the excellent cast will be found a cruel Frochard of unusual power and a crippled Pierre of the most appealing type, while the Countess, Jacques, the Minister of Police and the numerous other celebrated characters will be thoroughly well acted.

One of the Few Great Plays.

The fame of Kate Claxton as the blind girl, Louise, eclipsed for a time the brilliancy of the play, the "Two Orphans," but the true greatness of the play has restored it to its proper place in the public mind and it is now, in spite of all modern fads, permanently fixed in general opinion as one of the few greatest plays ever written. A new company will be seen in the play at the Charlevoix Theater May 5 and judging from the advance list of members it should give the masterpiece with exceptional power.

Frank L. Spencer, who managed the popular Laf-a-Lot theater in this city last summer, has arranged with Manager Bridge to play a one night stand of vaudeville at this house Monday evening, May 3. Mr. Spencer assures us that a first class entertainment will be given. See program elsewhere.

One Year of Prohibition in Georgia.

"The Lord hath done great things for us whereof we are glad." This is the language of our hearts at the close of the year 1908, our first year of prohibition in Georgia.

In spite of the inhuman interstate commerce law, that protects the liquor traffic and allows it to invade the territory that has voted it out, and in spite of the fact that Savannah has most flagrantly violated the law, there has been a marked decrease of crime especially of drunkenness and Georgia has withstood the financial panic wonderfully well.

Atlanta at the end of the year shows 3,001 fewer arrests for drunkenness, and 8,101 fewer arrests for all disorderly conduct. 300 fewer juvenile arrests; and the recorder's report says: "There has been a notable decrease in wife beatings."

In Fulton county the county police report arrests cut down more than half and say that there was not a criminal assault, nor an attempt at criminal assault, in the county during the year.

The income of the city of Atlanta for 1908 was $241,013 more than in 1907 with all the liquor licenses. The 1st of January, 1909, Building Inspector Hayes reports more building going forward than in any year of Atlanta's history—this in the face of the panic.

The figures from the Recorder's court of Atlanta were so convincing that the Atlanta Constitution, which has been a bitter foe of prohibition, said editorially: "Atlanta police court figures pay eloquent tribute to the absence of the open barroom. The experiment of the abandonment of the saloon cannot be questioned. Its success is established in these figures, which, in similar proportion, will undoubtedly be found in other communities from which the saloon has now disappeared. It is gone forever from Georgia!"

From every city comes similar good news. Rome reports 61 per cent decrease in crime; Albany, 65 per cent; Macon, 70 per cent; Brunswick, 82 per cent; etc., etc. In short, there has been an average decrease in the state of 40 per cent in crime in general, and of 75 per cent in drunkenness.

Savannah has most openly and shamefully defied the law; but from report of the year's crime, etc., in the Savannah Press, I gather these facts: During 1908 there were no opium joints in the city; no beggars; vagrancy cases were reduced from 270 to 139; gambling houses reduced from 14 to 3. There were 136 fewer minors arrested. Police have been busy, but the graver crimes have fallen off in good measure. The coroner's report for the year says: "For the first time in many years there was not a murder of a white man, nor any murder at all committed by a white man, in the city or country during the past year." All of which goes to prove that prohibition at its worst (as it surely is in Savannah) is better than license at its best!

In spite of the panic, and in spite of the fact that cotton, our great staple, was fifteen per cent cheaper than the year before, and that lumber and turpentine, two great sources of wealth, were reduced in price, and that thousands of dollars' worth of taxable property was removed by the exit of the liquor traffic, Georgia met all her obligations, and paid her school teachers by the 28th of December, and the tax books show a four million dollar increase in taxable property.

"Near beer" has given us some trouble, but we will get rid of it as we did of the bar-rooms.

One of the greatest blessings that the prohibition law has brought to us is the wonderful education of public sentiment. Many people who once looked with complacency on the selling and drinking of the strongest liquor, are now up in arms against "near beer," which is said to contain from two and one-half to four and one-half per cent of alcohol.

Georgia is so well pleased with prohibition that her war cry now is, "Extermination" of the liquor traffic, and may God speed the day!

How to Avoid Sore Throat.

If the girl whose throat is delicate and who catches cold easily will bathe her throat and chest each morning with cold water she will find it a wonderful help. This simple treatment is a sort of hardening process and will make one less liable to feel the harmful effects of bad weather and bleak winds.

According to the report of the state highway commissioner of Pennsylvania 325 miles of new roads were built during the past year at a cost of $3,000,000 or more.

PROPER CARE OF ORCHARDS

Result of Three More Years Told in Bulletin

Practical Test in the Growing of Apples

Proves Conclusively that if you Give Orchards Good Care, a Splendid Profit Will Result.

Work and results third year, 1906.

The spraying of the previous year had given the tree a more thrifty growth and the light crop allowed them to mature numerous fruit buds, so most of the trees set a good crop.

The youngest orchard was pruned this spring and the home orchard pruned again. All trees that had been pruned and the best unpruned ones in the third orchard were given four applications of bordeaux and paris green as follows: 1st application May 3-5, before blossoms opened; 2nd, May 22-26, after blossoms fell; 3rd, June 6-7; 4th, August 5-7. About 550 bushels were picked. The apples were put in barrels and crates and hauled to the barn on the home farm. After the picking season was over, these were graded and packed. Most of the crop as sold F. O. B. Athens at 75 cents per bushel box for fancy, $1.75 per barrel for No. 1 and $1.25 for No. 2. The early fruit was consigned to a commission house and some winter fruit was sold to home consumers. Apples were quite abundant in the locality and prices medium to low. The itemized account for the season is as follows:

Pruning	$10 75
Spraying	36 82
Picking and packing	80 20
Packages	49 08
Labels	2 25
Total cost	$179 10
Apples sold	404 74
Net profit	$225 64

Winter fruit for family use is credited at 50 cents per bushel, but no credit was made for early fruit, cider, vinegar and apple butter, for three families, or apples consumed by hogs.

A small orchard was also sprayed for a neighbor, he doing the pruning and paying for the spraying, and we harvesting and marketing the surplus fruit on halves. This amounted to $42.96 this season.

Work and results fourth year, 1907.

The San Jose scale now made its appearance in the orchards. It was already pretty well established on several trees and scale marks could be found on the fruit from nearly every tree. During April and early May, we sprayed these orchards thoroughly with lime and sulphur wash, going over the trees twice with the wind in opposite directions. This was made by cooking the concentrated materials in barrels with steam from the sawmill near home, whence they were hauled in closed barrels to the orchards four miles away. Enough was cooked in the morning to last during the day and diluted as used. The cost of this spraying was $26.27.

One spraying with Bordeaux mixture was also given at a cost of $22.02.

The best trees in the orchard hitherto unpruned were thinned out through the year, the total pruning bill being $10.

The crop was light, but 100 bushels, but there were no apples in the neighborhood and the fruit sold readily to neighbors at from 75 cents to $1.25 per bushel. The total cost was $74.54, the gross returns $89.25, leaving a net profit of $14.51.

Labor during this year charged at $1.50 per day, and $1 per day for team.

Work and results fifth year, 1908.

The pruning this year was chiefly the removal of sprouts and dead limbs and amounted to less than the average required. Four sprayings were made. The first just before the blossoms opened, using 3 lbs. of copper sulphate, 3 to 10 lbs. of lime and 1/4 lb. paris green to 50 gallons of water, applied with a hand pump. The second and third sprayings were made the last of May and June 10, after the blossoms fell; in these 3 lbs. arsenate of lead took the place of the paris green. The fourth spraying was made August 7 and 8 and 1½ lbs. arsenate of lead and 1-6 lbs. paris green was used and only one-half as much copper sulphate and lime as in the previous sprayings. The paris green was used to piece out a limited supply of arsenate of lead.

The fruit set abundantly on 16 trees of Red Astrachan, Famense, Winter Rambo, Jonathan, Baldwin, Northern Spy and Ben Davis. It was thought advisable to thin them and it was done at an average cost of 25 cents per tree.

In picking, the fruit was gathered and put directly into apple and cracker barrels and orange boxes, and set on low-down wagon with bolster springs beneath the platform and hauled to the barn. Baskets were used in the main for picking, but on high trees both baskets and sacks were used to save trips up and down the ladder.

One hundred thirty-one bushels were sold to farmers or villagers who secured them from the orchard or storage; 41 barrels of summer fruit were consigned to a Chicago commission house; 71 barrels of winter fruit were sold to grocers and consumers and the balance, or about two-thirds of the winter fruit was sold to a cold storage company the car being loaded with the barrels and crates just as picked from the trees.

Eighty-eight bushels of picked fruit, which was on hand (Nov. 15,) or distributed to neighbors and friends, are credited as sold, but no account is made of the fruit used by three families and given away during the summer, or of the cider apples which did much toward supporting a drove of hogs and furnished cider, vinegar, and apple butter for several families.

The items of all the expenses of producing and harvesting the crop for this season are as follows:

Hauling 3 loads of manure	$ 7 00
Pruning	2 70
Spraying, four applications	59 74
Thinning	3 95
Packages	71 74
Picking, packing and hauling	81 30
Total expense	$226 43
Apples sold 984 bushels	700 74
Net profit	$474 31

The manure was secured for the hauling, so no charge was made for it. All labor is charged at $1.50 per day, team $1. The spraying chemicals cost 8½ cents per pound for copper sulphate; 35 cents per pound for paris green; 10 cents per pound for arsenate of lead and ground lime costs 20 cents per 40-pound sack. The sulphate was purchased the previous year when prices were higher.

Apple barrels are charged at 40 cents each, which covers the cost of barrel, hauling and nailing, cracker barrels at 15 cents, which covers the cost and labor in repairing them; orange boxes at 3 cents.

AGAINST TUBERCULOSIS

New Bill Imposes Enlarged Duties upon Physicians

Governor Warner has signed a bill which imposes some positive and enlarged new duties on all physicians and health boards for the purpose of better protection against tuberculosis.

The bill makes it the duty of physicians to report to their local boards of health within twenty-four hours every case of tuberculosis that comes to their knowledge. Health officers must make quarterly reports in detail of all such cases to the state board of health, when tuberculosis subjects die or move from their apartments or premises the owner or person in charge must forthwith notify the authorities, and the apartments or premises cannot again be occupied until disinfected in accordance with the methods of the state board of health. Nothing must be removed until the disinfection has been done, and this must be in twenty-four hours.

There are about 1,600 health officers in the state, and they have heretofore done as they pleased in treating tuberculosis. Some regarded it as a communicable disease, and others not. The new law declares it to be a communicable disease like scarlet fever and diphtheria, and all health officers and other physicians are required to treat it as such, under penalty of prosecution for failure to do so.

There will be a dance at Ironton grange hall, Friday evening, May 21. Everybody welcome. Ice cream on the side. f-18-t-1-pd.

Lace curtains carefully laundered.

NEW PRIMARY LAW

As it Will Probably Pass the House and Senate

State Conventions Retained—Optional Features Reversed.

Below is given the main features of the primary election law which will probably be enacted, the committees of both houses having agreed, and the measure having passed the house with these changes.

Mandatory—On governor, lieutenant governor, United States senator, all congressmen, all legislators.

Optional—On all city and county officers and circuit judges but option reversed so that cities and counties must nominate by primary unless majority of electors votes not to do so.

Exempted—State officers below lieutenant-governor elected in fall, and the judicial and other state officers named in the spring.

Primary date—First Tuesday after first Monday in September making it day after Labor day.

Recounts—To be conducted by boards of canvassers, not by circuit judges as proposed in Dickinson bill.

Delegates—To county conventions to be named at primaries.

Conventions—State conventions for minor state officers retained. Delegates to be named at county conventions held simultaneously throughout state.

LOCAL OPTION FORCES

Organization for Next Year's Campaign Perfected

In Antrim County at Meeting Held at Bellaire Monday of Last Week.

An Antrim County Anti-Saloon League was organized at Bellaire Monday, of last week, under the direction of Revs. Holsaple and Baner.

A gathering of many leading citizens from various portions of the county was in attendance. Temporary officers were: Charles L. Underhill, president; C. E. Deusmore, secretary. A nominating committee was chosen and reported the following nominees for the permanent organization, who were elected: T. N. Chapin, president; William A. Evans, secretary; H. M. Waldron, treasurer.

A strong executive committee consisting of two members from each township represented was chosen.

It is understood that petitions will be circulated and presented at the October session of the board of supervisors.

About $400 was raised at the Bellaire meeting.

FINE TRAIN FOR MILWAUKEE MEN

Special Train to Carry Cream City Excursionists Will Present Fine Equipment.

The special train which will carry the members of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association through Western Michigan, will present one of the finest equipments ever sent into this territory. The full vestibuled, electric lighted Pullman train will consist of three sleepers, two diners, a buffet car, baggage car and day coach. It is probable that two engines will be required to haul this heavy equipment over some sections of the road.

At each place visited the Milwaukee business men are prepared to furnish a large part of the entertainment, as they carry with them their renowned male octette and the famous "Billy Reese" who is conceded to be the best story teller "on the road." On previous excursions Mr. Reese has been known to entertain large audiences with his anecdotes and tales and it is said that he never tells the same story twice. This year he says he has gathered in a large crop of new ones with which he will convulse new audiences.

The Milwaukee merchants will leave on their excursion Sunday morning, June 6th, returning June 13th, after visiting thirty one cities and towns in Michigan.

PASSING OF SALOONS

Took Place Very Quietly in Charlevoix County

Little Disturbance on the Last Night. Stocks Practically Sold Out.

The change from wet to dry took place very quietly Friday night, the crowd on the street being but very little larger than usual. While there was some drunkenness there was no disturbance or celebration and no arrests were made. During the entire week, the saloon keepers had been disposing of their stock at bargain prices and when the new order was ushered in they were practically sold out. Mr. Adams closed his place at supper time and all the rest were closed before the regular hour.

Reports from our neighboring towns are that the night passed off in an equally quiet manner, and the saloon is, we believe, a thing of the past, for all time, in Charlevoix County. An immense stock of liquid goods has been laid in by individuals, so, for a few weeks, considerable will be drank but the parading of the objectionable features of the booze habit before the public eye is past and, we also believe, that while we may have same attempts to violate the law, the officers will be vilgant, and a few months will find all rejoicing in the passing of the liquor traffic, which is doomed not only in this county, but in the state and nation.

How easily it can be exterminated the experience of Charlevoix county shows. Six months ago it would have sounded like an idle dream, if the prophecy had been made that May 1 would not see a saloon in the county, but it only lacked the initiative to be made and a few days work and the victory was won.

LEAGUE FOR SELE-IMPROVEMENT

Sends Out Appeal For Help to Their Fellowmen

Michigan State Prison, Jackson,
April 28, 1909

Dear Sir:

We men in this prison have reached the conclusion, which many of us should have reached long ago, that we must work out our own salvation, and with that end in view, we have formed a company which we call "The League for Self-Improvement," the object being just what the name indicates.

Surely, there is some way by which we, who have made mistakes and failures, who have fallen out of the tight, can win our way back; and that way we are trying to find. There is something better for the state, than the loss of time and money which prison life entails; something better for us than the ruin and degradation of the environment amidst which we live. Slowly, persistently, surely, we are groping our way to a better understanding of the part we may play in the battle of life—the part in which you may help us.

We have not solved the problem, but we are trying to find some way out of present conditions, some way which shall not only be better for us, but better for those dependent upon us, better for the state at large, better above all, for those about us who have made mistakes as we have, and for those who will make mistakes in the years to come.

In our endeavors we will need your good word, some day. Will you wish us "God speed," in our efforts?

Very respectfully,
The League For Self-Improvement.

State Encampment G. A. R.

Department Commander C. E. Foote, of the G. A. R., of Michigan, has issued general order, No. 7, which pertains to the coming state encampment in Kalamazoo. The order states that the encampment will begin with a meeting of the executive committee at the Burdick hotel at 10 a. m., June 22, and will last until the night of June 24th.

SEARCH AND SEIZURE BILL

Which Will Probably Pass the State Legislature.

Below we print the Dickenson search and seizure bill which is of peculiar interest to dry counties. There is every prospect that the measure will be enacted into law.

Every druggist is required to report to the prosecuting attorney in addition to his sales of liquor, his purchases, together with the name of the persons from whom the liquor was received, etc.

Liquor can be sold for medicinal purposes only on a written (not printed or typewritten) prescription of a regular practicing physician.

These prescriptions when filled must be cancelled by the druggist and filed with the prosecuting attorney at the time of the filing of his report of sales.

Liquor for other than medicinal purposes can be secured only on the affidavit of the person purchasing it, and to make a false affidavit makes the person swearing thereto guilty of perjury.

If any person makes a sworn statement before a justice of the peace that he has reason to believe that liquor is kept for illegal purposes in any building, house, warehouse, depot or any other place except in a private residence used as such, the justice must issue a warrant requiring the search of such premises. The person making the affidavit can designate the officer who is to serve the warrant and can accompany such officer in making the search. If liquors are found they hold as evidence against the person when he is prosecuted for violation of the law. C. O. D. shipments are construed to be sales at the place of delivery. Clubs where liquor is kept for the use of the members are made a place where liquor is being kept for it legal sale, and, therefore, a violation of the law.

The section of the present general liquor law which does not apply to local option counties permitting a justice to compel any drunken person to come before him and tell where the liquor was purchased, etc, is re-enacted so that it will apply in local option counties.

Ed. Yahr went to Petoskey Tuesday, returning the same day.

Homer Sly returned to Elk Rapids Wednesday afternoon.

Walter Olstrum got his fingers badly bruised by a rock falling on them.

Mrs. Worth was called to the bedside of her brother, who is very sick with appendicitis.

Mrs. Sherman, of Charlevoix, was here visiting her brother and family, Charles Sherman.

James Turk is laid up with a sore hand. The lime ate holes in his hand and caused blood poison.

Mr. Evart's little child is much better at this writing. Mr. Price's little ones are also on the the gain.

There won't be much news this week owing to the writer being confined to her bed with pneumonia.

Mrs. Sarah French was called home on account of the illness of her youngest sister, who is threatened with that dreadful disease, consumption.

Mrs. Tom Scroggie, formerly of this place, but now of Petoskey, is packing her household goods getting ready to have them shipped to Owosso, Michigan, where Mr. Scroggie has employment. Mrs. Scroggie will be ready to go in about two weeks.

The worst wind storm we have witnessed for some time, passed through here Thursday. The wind blew a gale and with it came snow and hail. It seems as if each storm trys to out do the other. This is terrible weather for the first of May. What does the weather man intend to do? Predict another winter?

Mrs. Bain, mother of Mrs. Newton Thomas, of this place, died Monday, April 26, at the hospital in Petoskey. Mrs. Bain has been ailing for some time, but took to her bed about six months ago. Mrs. Thomas has been with her mother all through her sickness. Deceased leaves besides her husband, one daughter and three sons.

FROM CENTRAL LAKE.

J. A. Triplett is setting out some fruit trees.

Mr. Addington, of Bay View, attended M. E. Sunday school here last week.

A. G. Morse finished an eight month's term of school in Frey district Friday.

A. S. Drake has a supply of fruit trees on hand as well as some new agricultural implements.

Merrit Hodge was over from Torch Lake Saturday and took back with him a number of fruit trees shipped from Monroe, Mich.

Mrs. Sadie Gates began a two month's term of school in the Dawson district Monday, having closed a term of school at Snowflake.

J. W. Morse closed an eight month's term of school at Creswell last Friday and has been engaged to teach there again next year.

The Anti-Saloon League have big meetings scheduled to come off at this place on May 9, at 10:30 a. m., Eastport 3:00 p. m. and at Atwood in the evening. Everybody should come and help start the ball rolling. We understand Charlevoix and East Jordan liquor men are putting saloons in our county. This will no doubt help out the cause, for the thicker liquor flows, the quicker the people will see its bad effects. We want Antrim county to roll up as big a majority as did Charlevoix. Lend a hand.

FROM CLARION.

Mr. and Mrs. Ben Babcock have moved to Springvale.

A daughter was born to Mr. and Mrs. Joe Miller last week.

George Sheatsley returned Friday from South Bend, Indiana.

VEST'S CAMPAIGN SPEECH.

Why a Small Boy Persisted In Hearing It Every Day.

"Senator Vest was making a buggy campaign in southeast Missouri some years ago," said a Missouri official. "His driver was a small boy, who was duly impressed with the importance of his distinguished passenger.

"At each town visited by Vest the boy hurried his team to a convenient livery barn and then raced for the courthouse, or wherever the 'speakin'' was to take place, and perched himself with painful regularity on the front seat. He invariably turned his eyes on the senator and took in every word of the speech as if his very life depended on it.

"Finally the lad's continued conspicuous presence among his auditors annoyed the senator, and he kindly but firmly reminded the boy that it was not necessary for him to attend every meeting.

"'I make the same speech each time. You have heard it often enough to know it by rote, so just put in your time in the future looking after the team,' he admonished his youthful driver.

"Despite the senator's objection, the boy was again in the front seat the next day and the following day. This enraged Vest, and he thundered:

"'Why do you persist in always occupying that front seat? Didn't I tell you I make the same speech every day? It's as old and stale to you as it is to me. Why insist on hearing it again and again?'

"'I want to see what you're going to do when you fergit it,' answered the boy. Vest capitulated."—St. Louis Republic.

The Word "Person."

General Benjamin F. Butler, it is said, once asserted that a woman was not a "person," and a London suffragette insists that the word "person" in its legal sense includes woman. The word has had an interesting history. Signifying by etymology something to make a sound through, the Latin "persona" began by meaning an actor's mask with its mouthpiece. Then it meant the character represented by the player—"dramatis personae." Then it came to mean the part or character one sustains in real life, and so the "persona ecclesiae," the man who represented the church, became known as a "person" in a special sense and was eventually spelled as "parson." On the other hand, "person" faded away to mean just anybody. And so, though a woman naturally resents being referred to as a "person" in ordinary talk, many women no less naturally desire to count as "persons" in the eye of the franchise law.—Chicago News.

FORTUNE CAME IN AUTO.

How One Farm Was Freed From a Mortgage by a Wife.

"My method of adding to our income is by keeping an inn for automobile travelers," a farmer's wife who recently paid a visit of several weeks to New York city told the reporter. "Our farm is ten miles away from the nearest railroad station, and it was next to impossible to get summer boarders. It was so difficult for me to market my butter and eggs and chickens that it didn't seem worth while.

"I used to be always wishing we could get nearer the station. It seemed to me that if we could only get where city people would be willing to come in the summer our fortune would be made. I have always been a good housekeeper, and my husband is known all through our part of the country as a good provider. Some people used to say that was the reason we never could get rid of the mortgage on the farm.

"The children and I had all but persuaded him to sell out and move to the village when our eldest daughter suggested opening an inn for the automobilists, who were continually stopping at our place for water and other little things. My two daughters set in work and brightened up the house and yards. Then they put out a sign at the crossroads and another on the front gatepost stating that we were prepared to furnish meals and lodgings for small parties.

"Then small parties soon began to come in, and they have been increasing in size and number ever since. At first there were only two rooms in which we could accommodate those who wished to remain overnight, but as my children have married off three more have become available.

"Yes, both my daughters have married since we turned our farmhouse into an inn four years ago, and during the last year both sons married also. That leaves me alone with a niece to look after the inn, while my husband still devotes himself to the farm.

"From the first our object in keeping the inn has been to brighten our home and add to the value of the farm. The house is old fashioned, and besides the kitchen there are eight rooms. They were very bare when we began to take in automobilists, but now, thanks to the money that they have left with us, there are not many farmhouses in this part of the country where you would find more books and more comfortable furnishings.

"One of the boys took a course at the agricultural college of Cornell university, and the other could have done that also if he hadn't preferred the Institute of Technology in Boston. As soon as he finished there last summer he took a job that was waiting for him, and then he got married. His specialty is electricity, and he wired our house and put in electric bells almost two years ago. That is one of the conveniences we would never have had if we hadn't opened the inn.

"We don't pretend to give our visitors anything fancy to eat—just the things raised on the farm well cooked and served. My niece has studied domestic science, so she knows how to cook by the new methods, while I can do about as well as the next one with my old recipes.

"You mustn't think we have had things all our own way. Several farmers who live near the road have put out the inn sign, and some of them have a good business, but as we began first and have kept our place up to the standard the visitors have continued to stop with us instead of going to neighboring inns. Besides, we haven't tried to change our house very much, only to freshen it up and make it more comfortable.

"I have found that what folks want when they come to the country is good country eating. That is what we give them at our inn—a plenty of it and with fresh, clean linen and china that is washed and polished until it shines. We no longer have a mortgage on the farm, and we have money in bank."

A RACE ON ICE.

The Skates That Got Away and Those That Were Recovered.

Thackeray once asked one of the men who let out skates on the Serpentine whether he had ever lost a pair through the omission to exact a deposit, and he replied that he had never done so, except on one occasion, when the circumstances made it almost pardonable.

A well dressed young fellow was having his second skate fastened on when he suddenly broke away from the man's hands and dashed to the ice. The next instant a thickset, powerful man was clamoring for another pair.

He was a detective in pursuit of his prey, and a very animating sight it was to watch the chase. He was, as he had boasted, a first rate skater, and it became presently obvious that he was running down his man.

Then the young fellow determined to run a desperate risk of liberty. The ice, as usual, under the bridge was marked "Dangerous," and he made for it at headlong speed. The ice bent beneath his weight, but he got safely through.

The sheriff's officer followed with equal pluck, but, being a heavier man, broke through and was drowned.

"His skates," said the narrator of the incident, "I got back after the inquest, but those the young gentleman had on I never saw again."—London Telegraph.

Bishop Butler's Generosity.

So many examples of episcopal cupidity have been cited of late that the average reader may be excused for believing the bishop of a century or so ago to have been an incarnation of greed. But against the Luxmores, the Watsons and the Portcouses may be set the saintly Butler, whose "Analogy" is still used as a text book for clerical examinations. Butler kept open house at Durham, where he dispensed hospitality with a lavish hand. On one occasion a man called at the palace soliciting a subscription for some charitable object. "How much money is there in the house?" asked Butler of his secretary. The secretary after investigation replied that there was £500. "Give it to him, then," replied the philosopher bishop, "for it is a shame that a bishop should have so much."—London Chronicle.

He (reading)—"Of love that never found his earthly close"—

She (interrupting)—Isn't Tennyson just great? You can always learn something from him. Now I understand why it is that Cupid is always represented without any. But please go on!—Brooklyn Life.

THE CAPTAIN OF the KANSAS

By LOUIS TRACY,

Author of "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," Etc.

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY EDWARD J. CLODE

CHAPTER II—Continued.

"Then you have gained the best thing in the world!" cried the doctor, throwing out his arms expansively.

The two became good friends as the voyage progressed. Christobal was exceedingly well informed and delighted in a thoughtful listener like Elsie. Isobel, tiring at times of the count, would join in their conversation and display a spasmodic interest in the topics they discussed. There were only six other passengers—a Baptist missionary and his wife, three mining engineers and an English globe trotter, a singular being who appeared to have roamed the entire earth, but whose experiences were summed up in one of two words—every place he had seen was either "fair" or "rotten."

Even Isobel failed to draw him further, and she said one day in a temper, after a spirited attempt to extract some of his stored impressions: "The man reminds me of one of those dummy books you see occasionally, bound in calf and labeled 'Gazetteer of the World.' When you try to open a volume you find that it is made of wood."

So they nicknamed him "Mr. Wood" and Elsie once inadvertently addressed him by the name.

"What do you think of the weather, Mr. Wood?" she asked him at breakfast.

He chanced to notice that she was speaking to him.

"Rotten," he said.

Perhaps he wondered why Miss Maxwell flushed and the others laughed. But in actual fact he was not far wrong in his curious choice of an adjective that morning. Dr. Christobal's dismal forebodings had been justified on the second day out. Leaden clouds, a sullen sea and occasional puffs of a stinging breeze from the southwest offered a sorry exchange for the sunny skies of Chile.

Though the Kansas was not a fast ship, she could have made the entrance to the strait of Magellan on the evening of the fourth day had not Captain Courtenay wished to navigate the most dangerous part of the narrows by daylight. His intent, therefore, was to pick up the Evangelistas light about midnight and then crack ahead at fourteen knots, so as to be off Felix point, on Desolation Island, by dawn.

This was not only a prudent and seamanlike course, but it would conduce to the comfort of the passengers. The ship was now running into a stiff gale. Each hour the sea became heavier, and even the 8,000 tons of the Kansas felt the impact of the giant rollers on her starboard bow. Dinner therefore promised to be a meal of much discomfort, cheered only by the knowledge that as soon as the vessel reached the lee of Desolation Island the giant waves of the Pacific would lose their power and all on board would enjoy a quiet night's rest.

There were no absentees at the table. Dr. Christobal strove to enliven the others with the promise of peace ere many hours had passed.

"Pay no heed to those fellows," he cried as the ship quivered under the blow of a heavy sea, and they heard the thud of many tons of water breaking over the bows and fore hatch, while the defeated monster washed the tightly screwed port with a venomous swish. "They cannot harm us now. Let us rather thank kindly Providence, which provided Magellan's fairway. Think what it would mean were we compelled to weather the cape."

A spiteful sea sprang at the Kansas and shook her from stem to stern. The ship groaned and creaked as though she were in pain. She staggered an instant and then swung irresistibly forward with a fierce plunge that made the plates dance and cutlery rattle in the fiddles.

"I suppose we must endure five hours of this?" said Elsie bravely.

"I don't like it. Why does not Captain Courtenay or even Mr. Boyle put in an appearance? I have hardly seen either of them since the day I came aboard."

"All ladies like to see an officer in the saloon during a storm," commented Christobal. "I plead guilty to a weakness in that direction myself, though I know he is much better employed on the bridge."

A curious shock, sharper and altogether more penetrating than the Thor's hammer blow of a huge wave, sounded loud and menacing in their ears. The ship trembled violently and then became strangely still. The least experienced traveler on board knew that the engines had stopped. They felt a long turch to port when the next sea climbed over the bows. At once the Kansas righted herself and rode on even keel, while the stress and turmoil of her fight against wind and wave passed away into a sustained silence.

The half caste stewards glanced at each other and drew together in whispering groups, but the chief steward, an Englishman, who had turned to leave the saloon, changed his mind and uttered a low growl of command which sent his subordinates' attention if not their thoughts back to their work. In the strained hush the running along the deck of men in heavy sea boots was painfully audible. Water could be heard pouring through the scuppers. Steam was rushing forth somewhere with vehement bluster. These sounds only accentuated the extraordinary truce in the fight of ship against sea. The Kansas was stricken dumb if not dead.

"Something has gone wrong," said Elsie in a low voice.

Dr. Christobal nodded carelessly.

"A burst steam pipe probably. Such things will happen at times. We are bove to for the moment."

He trailed on the ignorance of his hearers. The chief steward heard his explanation and looked at him keenly. Christobal caught the glance.

"I suppose we shall lose an hour or so now?" he asked.

"Yes, sir. It will be all right by the time you have finished dinner."

The meal drew to its close without much further talk. An American engineer was the first passenger to rise, but the chief steward whispered in his ear. He returned to the table.

"Say," he said calmly, "we can't quit yet. The companion hatch is closed. We must remain here a bit."

"Do you mean that we are battened down?" demanded Isobel shrilly, and her face lost some of its beauty in an ashen pallor.

"Something of the sort, Miss Baring. Anyway, we can't go on deck."

"But—I insist on being told what is the matter."

The American knew little of ships, but he knew a great deal about mines, and in a mine if an accident happens the man in charge cannot desert his post to give information to those who are anxious for it. So he replied laconically:

"Guess the captain will tell us all about it after awhile, Miss Baring."

CHAPTER III

THE fierce hissing of the continuous escape of steam excited alarm in those not accustomed to machinery. Men and women share the unreasoning panic of animals when an unknown force reveals its pent-up fury. They forget that safety valves are provided; that diminished pressure means less risk. The knowledge that restraint, not freedom, is dangerous comes ever in the guise of a new discovery.

The mining engineers of course did not share this delusion.

"There must be something serious the matter or they would not be wasting power like that," murmured the American to one of his fellow professionals.

"A smashup in the engine room. Nothing is more certain," was the answer in Spanish.

"Wonder if any one is hurt."

The Spaniard bent a little nearer. "What can you expect?" he whispered sympathetically.

In the unnatural peacefulness of the ship's progress, disturbed only by the roar of the superheated vapor, they all heard the opening of a door at the head of the saloon stairway. The third officer appeared, his wet oilskins gleaming and dripping.

"Dr. Christobal, the captain wishes to speak to you," he said.

Christobal rose and crossed the saloon.

"As you are here, won't you tell the ladies there is nothing to be afraid of in the mere stopping of the engines?" he suggested.

"Oh, the ship is right enough," was the hasty response. "There has been an accident in the stokehold. That is all."

"Want any help?" demanded the American.

"Well- I'll ask the captain."

Evidently anxious to avoid further questioning, he ran up the companionway. Christobal, followed, and the door was closed and bolted again.

"I hate the word 'accident.' It covers so many horrid possibilities," said Isobel.

"I am afraid some poor fellows have been injured and that is why Captain Courtenay sent for Dr. Christobal," said Elsie.

"Oh, of course, I meant that. I was not thinking of the mere delay, though it is annoying that a breakdown should occur here."

"It would be equally bad anywhere else," put in the missionary's wife timidly.

"By no means," was the sharp response. "If we were in the strait, for instance, we could signal to San Ildefonso or Sandy point, and there would be other vessels passing. Here we are in the worst possible place."

To all appearance, Miss Baring alone among the passengers, now that Christobal was gone, realized vaguely the perilous plight of the Kansas. In a maritime community like that of Valparaiso there was every reason to know and dread the rock bound coast which fringed the southern path toward civilization. Strange, half forgotten stories of the terrors which await a disabled ship caught in a southwesterly gale on the Pacific side of Tierra del Fuego rose dimly in her mind; and the advancing darkness did not tend toward cheerfulness.

The curious sense of waiting, they knew not for what, which dulled the thoughts and stilled the tongues of the small company at the table soon communicated itself to the stewards. The men stood in little knots, exchanging few words, and those mostly meaning less. But the chief steward, whose trained ear caught the regular beat of the donkey engine, woke them up with a series of sharp orders.

"Switch on the lights," he said loudly. "Clear the table and hurry up with the coffee. Get a move on those fellows, Gomez. Have you never before been in a ship when the screw stopped?"

The Gomez thus appealed to was the Englishman's second in command. He acted as interpreter when anything out of the common was required. He muttered a few words to the Hispano Indian patois which his hearers best understood, and the scene in the saloon changed with wondrous suddenness. The glow of the electric lamps banished the gathering shadows. The luxurious comfort of the apartment soon dispelled the notion of danger.

The noise of the steam exhaust ceased as abruptly as it began. The ship was riding easily in spite of the heavy sea. And then, while the occupants of the saloon were endeavoring to persuade each other that all was well, the wind wail of the siren thrilled them with increased foreboding. It was not the warning note of a fog or the sharp course signal for the guidance of a passing ship, but a sustained trumpeting which announced to any steamer hidden in the darkening waste of waters that the Kansas was not under control. It was a wild, insistent appeal for help, the voice of the dismasted vessel proclaiming her need, and the answer seemed to come in a fiercer shriek of the gale, while the added fury of the blast brought a curling sea over the poop. The Kansas staggered and shook herself clear.

It was a nerve racking moment. It demanded the leadership of a strong man, and there are few gatherings in Anglo Saxondom which cannot produce a Cæsar when required.

"Say," shouted the American, his clear voice dominating the stormoff, "that gave us a shower bath. If we could just stand outside and see ourselves we should look like an illuminated fountain."

That was the right note. Belief in the ship, contempt of the darkness and the gale. The crisis passed.

"There really cannot be a heavy sea," said Elsie, cheerfully inaccurate; "otherwise we should be pitching or rolling, perhaps both, whereas we are actually far more steady than when dinner commenced."

"I find these lulls in the storm most trying," complained Isobel. "They remind me of some wild animal hunting its prey, creeping up with silent stealth and then springing."

"I have never before heard a fog horn sounded so continuously," said the missionary's wife, a Mrs. Somerville. "Don't you think they are whistling for assistance?"

"Assistance? What sort of assistance can anybody give us here? I'll bet the ship rights herself very soon we don't know what may happen."

Isobel seemed to have a premonition of evil, and she paid no heed to the effect her words might have on the others. Although the saloon was warm, almost uncomfortably hot owing to the closing of the main air passages, she shivered.

Mr. Somerville drew a book from his pocket. "If that be so," he said gently, "may I suggest that we seek aid from one who is all powerful? We are few and of different religions, but in this hour we can surely worship at a common altar."

"Right!" said the taciturn Englishman, varying his adjective for once. The missionary offered up a short but heartfelt prayer and, finding that he carried his congregation with him, read the opening verse of hymn No. 370, "For Those at Sea."

The stewards, most of whom understood a few words of English, readily grasped the fact that the padre was asking for help in a situation which they well knew to be desperate. They drew near reverently and even joined in the simple lines:

Oh, hear us when we cry to thee
For those in peril on the sea!

During the brief silence which followed the singing of the hymn it did indeed seem to their strained senses that the fierce violence of the gale had somewhat abated. It was not so in reality. A steady fall in the barometer foretold even worse weather to come. Courtenay, assured now that the main engines were absolutely useless, thought it advisable to get steering way on the ship by rigging the foresail, double reefed and trapped. The result was quickly perceptible. The Kansas might not be pooped again, but she would travel more rapidly into the unknown.

Yet this afforded only another instance of the way men reason when they seek to explain cause from effect.

Every Little Saved Will Keep You Ahead

If you can't save ten dollars a month, save a hundred cents. One dollar saved is something ahead; it represents more than just that amount. The first dollar is doubly worth the effort. Each succeeding dollar saved requires less effort. Keep at it. Others have learned by experience that it pays to save.

The hoisting of that strip of stout canvas was one of the time factors in the story of an eventful night, for it was with gray faced despair that the captain gave the requisite order when the second engineer reported that his senior was dead, the crown of two furnaces destroyed and the engines clogged if not irretrievably damaged by fallen debris. None realized better than the young commander what a disastrous fate awaited his ship in the gloom of the flying scud ahead. There was a faint chance of encountering another steamship which would respond to his signals. Then he would risk all by laying the Kansas broadside on in the effort to take a tow rope aboard. Meanwhile it was best to bring her under some sort of control, the steam steering gear, driven by the uninjured donkey engine, being yet available.

In the saloon Elsie had shielded her face in her hands to hide the tears which the entreaty of the hymn had brought to her eyes. Some one whispered to her:

"Won't you sing something, Miss Maxwell?"

It was the American. He judged that the sweet voice which unconsciously led the singing of the hymn must be skilled in other music.

She looked up at him, her eyes shining.

"Sing! Do you think it possible?" she asked.

"Yes. You can do a brave thing, I guess, and that would be brave."

"I will try," she said, and she walked to the piano, which was screwed athwart the deck in front of the polished mahogany sheath of the steel mainmast. It was to her credit to play some lively excerpts from the night operettas to ragtime, but the secret influences of the hour were stronger than her studied intent, and when her fingers touched the keys they wandered almost without volition into the subtle harmonies of Gounod's "Ave Maria." She played the air first, then, gaining confidence, she sang the words, using a Spanish version which had caught her fancy. It was good to see the dazzling eyes and impassioned gestures of the Chilean stewards when they found that she was singing in their own language. These men, owing to their acquaintance with the sea and knowledge of the coast, were now in a state of panic. They would have burst the bonds of discipline on the least pretext. So, as it chanced, the voice of the English senorita reached them as the message of an angel, and the spell she cast over them did not lose its potency during some hours of dangerous toil.

Excited applause rewarded the song. Virgil by example, the dapper French youth approached the piano and asked Elsie to play Beranger's "Roi d'Yvetot."

The Frenchman took the merry monarch seriously, but the lilting melody pleased everybody except Mr. Wood

There being no further business the council adjourned.

G. E. DUTTON, City Clerk

His Occupation.

A big, brawny fellow in answer to a question in a justice's court as to what he did for a living said:

"Well, sir, in the spring I ketches an' sells young mockin' birds, in the summer I mostly sells rattlesnake buttons fer rattles fer the babies, but in the winter I sometimes has to chop wood."—Atlanta Constitution.

Enlarging the Limit.

"You are very foolish, Alfred. That is your third cigar, and you know the doctor limited you to one a day."

"Yes, dear, but I've consulted two other doctors, and each has allowed me one cigar a day; total, three!"

Every person has two educations—one which he receives from others and one, more important, which he gives himself.—Gibbon.

JAPANESE CADETS.

Military School Exercises Include Hand to Hand Conflicts.

In the Japanese military school, where I saw a Spartan system of education, the exercises of the cadets with pikes, rifles and broadswords were not approached by anything of the kind that I had witnessed in Europe. It was fighting of the fiercest character.

At the end of the struggle there was a hand to hand combat, which lasted until the victors stood triumphant over the bodies of the vanquished and tore off their masks.

In these exercises, which were very severe, the cadets struck one another fiercely and with wild cries, but the moment a prearranged signal was given or the fight came to an end the combatants drew themselves up in a line, and their faces assumed an expression of woolen composure.

In all the public schools preference was given to military exercises, and the scholars took part in them with enthusiasm. Even in their games they practiced running, dodging and sudden, unexpected attacks.

The history of Japan was everywhere made a means of strengthening the pupils' patriotism and their belief in Japan's invincibility. Particular stress was laid upon the country's successful wars, the heroes of them were extolled, and the children were taught that none of Japan's military enterprises had failed.—McClure's Magazine.

A WARSHIP'S RAM.

The Huge Steel Beak Is Capable of Inflicting Terrible Injury.

A modern ram is nothing more than a huge steel beak, or spur, which is fitted to the prow of the battleship for the purpose of destroying an enemy's ship in time of war by the force of collision. Indeed, should a vessel succeed in driving her ram against another warship the blow, if delivered at full speed, would be sufficient to crush in the ship's side and sink her immediately.

A battleship's ram weighs about forty tons and is cast all in one piece. It is of solid steel and capable of striking a tremendous blow. Shell proof a man-of-war may be made, but the skill of the naval architect is unequal to the task of designing a ship that can resist the ram.

Great care must be exercised in fixing such a heavy piece of steel. The method generally adopted is as follows: The ram is suspended from a strong derrick, the bottom end of which is attached to the extreme end of the vessel's keel plates. The gap between the ram and the uncompleted part, or hull, is walled tight compartments. The weapon is so fixed that it strikes just below the armored belt, where resistance is weakest, while it is so shaped that the rammed vessel can by reversing her engines easily disentangle herself from the ship she has struck.—Philadelphia Record.

THE RHINOCEROS.

This Malicious Brute Is the Assassin of the Jungle.

If the genius of hell used up all his mental energy making a devil for the animal kingdom, he could not have created a more uncertain, malicious and ugly brute than the rhinoceros. This animal has buried more hunters than all other big game combined. It seems to be the hired assassin of the jungle.

Its success as a homicide is not due to the fact that it seeks its victim, but because its victim falls over it. If the rhino knows that there is an enemy about, it will try to get away without being seen. If, on the other hand, it thinks that by keeping still it will be passed unnoticed, it stays as silent and motionless as Gibraltar, its little hog eyes watching the direction of the noise and its nose sniffing the air.

Should an enemy show up suddenly in the jungle the rhino charges like a flash, nose down and horns leveled like swords for the thrust, its huge bulk crushing through the brush like an express train. It is always a fight to the death, for a rhinoceros, once in a fight, wins or dies, and it mostly wins if it is not confronted with an express rifle in the hands of a cool, good shot.—Hampton's Magazine.

The Old Time Album.

"The terrors of the autograph album" must have been more general in the middle of the last century than they are now. The volume had embossed pages of various colors and showed alternate literature and art—original verses and drawings of ruins and bridges heightened with white chalk. Girls presented it for contributions so universally that Charles Dickens was on one occasion much astonished to find none forthcoming. He had actually brought with him some verses addressed to a beautiful maiden, on whose parents he was calling, and he carried them away again. Sending them to her by post, he wrote, "I had meant to put these lines into your album, but you, who do nothing like anybody else, did not produce one."—London Standard.

In Morocco.

In Morocco the prevailing tone is grayish white, men's clothes and houses, towns, bushes, tall umbelliferne, nodding like ghosts in autumn—all are white; white sands upon the shore and in the Sahara and over all a white and saddening light, as if the sun was tired of shining down forever on the unchanging life. In no part of Morocco I have visited does the phrase "gorgeous east" have the least meaning, and this is always noted by the wandering easterners, who find the country dull and lacking in color compared with Asia, or, as the Arabs call it, "Biad Es Schark."—"A Journey to Morocco."

"Now, sir," said the barrister to the musical expert witness, "you say the two melodies are the same, but different. What do you mean by that, sir?"

"I meant the notes were the same, but the accent different."

"Accent! What is musical accent? Can you see it?"

"No."

"Can you feel it?"

"Yes."

"Come, sir! None of this beating about the bush. Tell the court and jury the meaning of what you call accent."

"Accent in music is the same as emphasis in speech. If I were to say, 'You are an ass,' the accent rests on 'ass.' But if I were to say, 'You are an ass,' it rests on 'you.'"

This concluded the cross examination.—London Express.

THEATRICAL

Spencer's vaudeville at the Bridge theater is a big success.

The program of vaudeville and moving pictures put on for one night, at the Bridge theater, Monday, was pronounced by all who saw it, "a fine show."

Holmans rank as one of the world's greatest contortionists is unquestioned and the laughable sketch, "Holding the Fort," presented by the Fairburns was a shriek from the very start.

Mr. Spencer maintains his previously established reputation for putting on a good show.

Manager Bridge is to be congratulated on the high class entertainments he is putting on at the Charlevoix theater this season. Both Ma's New Husband and Montana were first class in their different lines. Tonight the Two Orphans, a Conrad attraction, will be produced, which in itself is a guarantee of merit.

Manager Bridge announces "My Boy Jack," a conrad attraction, which delighted a large audience last summer, for June 8.

James J. Hill, the great railroad builder and owner of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific railroads, insists that the present high price of wheat is due to natural causes, and not to a corner, which he says is no longer possible in the United States. In discussing the subject with a friend in Washington Mr. Hill said: "It is popularly believed that certain gentlemen in Chicago have a corner on the visible wheat supply of the country. I doubt it. A few years ago I made a speech in the west containing some prophecies that may soon be realized. I directed attention to the fact that while the population of the United States had increased sixty-five per cent the production of food stuffs had increased only twenty-five per cent. The significance of the disparity between the increasing population and the failure of the country to keep up production of grains in like proportion should not be overlooked. We are now buying barley from Argentine. The time is not so far distant when we will be importing wheat. High prices for wheat will continue. The price of that commodity will never go to the low figures that obtained in former years in this country."

A representative of the pine lands of Northern Michigan at the recent meeting of the West Michigan Development Bureau, stated that in the course of ten years lands which are now considered almost worthless will be selling from $50 to $75 per acre. This seeming miracle will be performed by treating the soil with lime in quantities of from 1,000 to 1,500 pounds per acre, and then sowing alfalfa, which has roots of sufficient length to reach down to the water table and secure sufficient moisture to mature three crops per year. This alfalfa will restore the humus to the soil and make possible the raising of other crops that cannot at present be raised.

On the right of the speaker in representative hall is a life sized painting of John T. Rich. Next is a painting of the first governor of Michigan, Stevens T. Mason, and next further along is Julius Caesar Burrowe's life sized shape in a framed canvas. On the left of the speaker are the paintings of Lewis Cass and Douglass Houghton. But between the speaker's rostrum and the Cass picture is a blackboard originally intended to display committee meeting notices. It is now doing double duty. On afternoons when the Detroit team is playing at home the score is shown by innings on the board. A telephone company provides the service and everybody is satisfied.

Morris Piper, of Lake City, stepped into a couple of red-hot custard pies that his wife had just taken out of the oven and as he was in his stocking feet the toes on both feet are so badly burned that amputation may be necessary.

Piper arrived home from town late at night. As he was cold he pulled off his boots to warm his feet on the heater in the living room. Then he went into an adjoining room.

It was on the floor of this room that Mrs. Piper had placed two red hot pies to cool. Piper put his right foot in one and with a howl of pain unwillingly put his left foot into the other.

The hot milk custard worked itself through his socks and before they could be removed his feet were nearly roasted.

Literary Notes

Edward Everett Hale Talks of Old Times.

Edward Everett Hale in Woman's Home Companion for May reminds us that he has seen the world progress from stage coach to airship. Dr. Hale enjoys nothing better than to tell how things were when he was a boy. Among other entertaining things in this particular article mentioned here, he says:

"Let us now tell of the annual journey to which we children in a large family looked back every year as to the great event of the year. My father's father and mother lived in Westhampton in Massachusetts, the town where he was born. We lived in Boston and the distance between us and Westhampton was about one hundred and ten miles. We children expected to make the journey every summer to see Westhampton, our grandfather and grandmother, our uncles, aunts and cousins. To compass this visit an open carriage such as we then called a laroncbe came around to the house in Boston at six o'clock in the morning. Two trunks were fastened on it behind, or perhaps one trunk swung by straps from the hinder axle. On the back seat of this laroncbe sat my father and mother and one of the smaller of us children. On an opposite seat sat two, and on the higher driver's seat with Fallam, sat one or two more.

"At Framingham, where we dined, and at Worcester, where we slept, we children reveled in the delights of country taverns. In those days we did not say much about 'hotels.' From Worcester, on the second day, we 'tried the adventure,' as Amadis would say, of a longer drive to Northampton. Those hills of Worcester county and Hampshire are not mole hills, and you all see that the horses did well if by night on the second day we were at Northampton. The next morning, ten miles more carried us to grandpapa's house.

"Today, if I chose to take the same journey, I should go to Northampton in two or three hours, more or less, and take the same charming drive to the dear old house in an hour more."

Working the Brood Mare.

A knowledge of just what is right and safe to do with a working brood mare will prevent some little mistake which perhaps may have serious consequences and will enable one to make the best possible use of her time. While a mare may safely be worked hard and steadily from the day she is bred until the day she drops her foal, she should be kept clear of excessively hard pulls and strains, such as are apt to occur in hauling grain on the road in a hilly country, working with smooth shoes or none at all when the roads are icy and hauling feed and manure through muddy fields and feed lots in the early spring.

Careful hauling on the road and steady work in the field, plowing in crops and leading them are very safe for the mare. I have used mares at spring plowing up to the day their foals were dropped, says a horseman.

Dairy Wisdom.

Winter butter sells at a fancy price, but not when the milk and cream are allowed to collect kitchen and cellar odors.

Too much cream for the calf is about as bad as too much money for the boy.

Milk cows should be groomed but more than one hour before milking. A stiff brush should be used to remove dry matter and places soiled with fresh manure cleaned by washing.

Take the milk to the house directly after you are through milking. You cannot afford to run the risk of losing or getting filth into the food you have received from your cows.

Feeding Calves Skimmilk.

A good order to follow in feeding the skimmilk calf is as follows: Start with new milk as it is given immediately after calving; feed new milk for a short period. Gradually add skimmilk to the new until the skimmilk is fed as a whole food. Supply the loss of fat by using flaxseed meal cooked so as to form a jelly, adding gradually until a tablespoonful is used at a feed. Never overfeed the calf.

SUCCESS IN DAIRYING.

Henry Dorrence, a successful Connecticut dairyman, tells as follows how he established his dairy and is making it pay:

"The first step in establishing my dairy was to collect a herd of cows bred for profitable production for several generations. If one cannot afford to buy a full herd of pure bred cattle the best thing to do is to purchase a few pure bred cows with satisfactory official records and of the breed best adapted to one's business and to fill out the herd with grades of the same breed.

"The next and most important selection is the bull. Never be 'penny wise and pound foolish' in this. Whoever practices such economy will surely have reason to regret it sooner or later. The bull should be out of a cow admitted to advanced registry (or with an equivalent record) and should be a good type of the breed. Living on a farm which is hilly, rocky and hilly, I breed Ayrshires because I think they are best suited to those conditions. Of average size, carrying no surplus bone or meat, they possess a constitution strong enough to stand several years of severest strain in the dairy without breaking down and often give over ten times their weight in milk in a year without overfeeding.

"I keep only the heifers from my very best cows. Inbreeding may be sometimes advisable, but the animals must be very carefully mated, as two animals closely related bearing the same defects would be more liable to transmit the defect than their more desirable qualities. Some think a heifer should not deliver her first calf under three years of age. I think the longer she goes without developing the milking tendency the less of that tendency she has to transmit to her offspring. Of course she should not be bred so young as to retard her growth. I consider two and a half years a suitable age for the heifer's life work to begin.

"As a result of the above policy one of my cows earned me in one year $200 in 365 consecutive days. A great factor in attaining these results is a twenty-five cent spring balance continually hanging in the stable by which I ascertain the earnings of each cow and can weed out the less profitable.

"I am particular to have each cow milked by the same man, as far as possible, and to have the cows put up in the same place each time, the object being to keep the cows undisturbed by change of surroundings. These little details are important in the handling of the naturally nervous dairy cow.

"Four things I consider indispensable in feeding my herd first, bulk; second, a large per cent of protein; third, succulence; fourth, palatability. To furnish bulk in the grain ration I depend upon wheat bran, which also helps to prevent indigestion and the fevered condition of the blood that causes garget and other diseases of the udder. In supplying protein I have been very successful with cottonseed meal and have never had trouble with diseases of the udder if it was fed with wheat bran. It is essential to have a good quality of cottonseed meal, a cheap grade being dear at any price. Roots and silage supply succulence. These two feeds ought to be the mainstay of the dairyman. I raise rutabagas, which are cheaply, easily and quickly grown, planting them July 4. I can cut a crop of hay and raise rutabagas on the same land as a second crop. The tops are as valuable as the roots to increase the flow of milk.

"Like any other machine, a dairy herd should be run to the limit of its capacity to realize the greatest profit. After a cow has had her fill of other feeds she still will make room for a daily peck of turnips, which helps at the pail and in the digestion and assimilation of other food. An occasional change of food is appreciated by animals as well as people. I have noticed many times an increased flow of milk after changing the feed for a short time. The feeding should be regular and the heaviest ration given at night, when the cow is quiet and has a longer time for assimilation.

"When the herd is at pasture in summer remember that an hour in early morning is worth two at night. Watch the cows the first hour after you turn them out. You will see them eating. Look any time during the last two hours of the afternoon, and most of them are lying down. I have seen this when the pasture was so short the cows had to be fed in the barn. In short, good cattle, good feed and good care make good profits."

SORE MOUTH IN SWINE.

Cause of This Infectious Disease and How It Should Be Treated.

Infectious sore mouth appears occasionally and causes much loss in young swine, says Professor Thomas Shaw. It seldom attacks those over the age of six weeks. It is a germ disease and is highly infectious, but fortunately it does not appear very often. It is liable to be more prevalent in wet seasons, when the pens become more or less filthy and especially the yards connected with them. The disease comes from a germ which is said to be normal to the intestines of swine.

The infection, it is thought, usually comes from the teats of the sows, the former coming in contact with the droppings and filth containing the germs. But it may come also through the medium of dry dust. As it is very infectious, as soon as it is discovered the sow and her litter should be isolated, or it may work much harm in a herd of young swine. Usually more than 50 per cent of the affected animals die, and those that recover are usually more or less deformed about the mouth because of the sloughing of the skin.

The first indications of the disease will show themselves probably in a disposition by the young animals to remain aloof and to neglect to take food. Then there is inflammation in spots in various portions of the mouth and around the lips. These form ulcers, and then sloughing follows. In this way cavities larger or smaller are formed. These in some instances cause the teeth in part, at least, to drop out. In from three to ten days death follows in the case of those which do not recover.

Treatment may be successful in some instances. It consists in dipping the animals head downward two or three times a day and for three or four days in a solution of permanganate of potassium. It is made by dissolving one ounce of the potassium in each gallon of water. Preventive measures are vastly better. These include, first, disinfecting the pens occasionally; second, cleaning away the manure frequently, and, third, isolating the affected animals with all promptness.

Sheep Feeding Tests.

The Wisconsin experiment station used yearling wethers to learn the value of various grain rations. Uniform animals were selected and put into several lots to receive different grain rations, but allowed to run together for roughage and pasture. Results as summarized by Professor L. R. Russell of the Wisconsin experiment station are suggestive. Grain rations for each of four lots were as follows: Lot 1, equal parts of cracked corn and whole oats; lot 2, equal parts of cracked peas and whole oats; lot 3, equal parts of cracked barley and whole oats; lot 4, whole oats, roughage pasture, hay, cabbage and roots; feeding period Aug. 1 to about Nov. 15. For several weeks at beginning wethers given little or no roughage and grain only once a day. Variations in the feed were made, so as to have the wethers in best possible condition at the time of showing. The test showed that lot 1, fed cracked corn and whole oats, made the largest and cheapest gain, while the lot fed barley and oats ranked second. Peas and oats were the most expensive feeds, but produced a firm handling quality. For this reason they are highly recommended by experienced men in feeding sheep for the show ring.

A Three Horse Evener.

Many times on the farm one has use for an extra three horse evener. A Wisconsin farmer who has constructed one that works satisfactorily says of it:

"An easily constructed and effective three horse evener may be made by almost any farmer, and it will make each horse do his share of the work. All that is required for this evener is the 2 by 6 or 2 by 8 inch stick shown in the illustration. It should be about six feet and eight inches long, with one hole bored in the center and one about three inches from either end. The singletrees are fastened on with clevices and you are ready for work. The center tugs must be crossed, as shown, and care must be used to see that the tugs are the right length. By crossing the tugs the pull will be equally distributed on each horse."

EVENER FOR THREE HORSES.

The Captain of the Kansas.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," Etc.

Copyright, 1903, by Edward J. Clode.

The "Oh-h's" and "Ah-ah's" of the chorus apparently stirred Otto to speech. He strolled from a corner of the salon to the side of Gray, the American engineer, and said with a contemptuous nod toward the singer:

"What rot!"

"Not a bit of it. He's all right. Won't you give us a song next?"

If Gray showed the face of a sphinx, so did Mr. Wood, whose real name was Tollemache. He bent a little nearer.

"Seen the rockets?" he asked.

"No. Are we signaling?"

"Every minute; have counted fifteen."

"You don't say. Things are in a pretty bad shape, then?"

"Rotten."

"Well, like the Rabbit, we must lie low and say nothing."

This opinion was incontrovertible. Moreover, Tollemache was not one who needed urging to keep his mouth shut. Indeed, this was by far the longest conversation he had indulged in since he came aboard, nor was he finished with it.

"Ship will strike soon," he said.

Gray turned on him sharply. "Oh, nonsense!" he exclaimed. "What has put that absurd notion into your head?"

"Know this coast."

"But we are far out at sea."

"Fifty miles from danger line two hours ago; thirty now."

"Are you sure?"

"Certain."

"Do you mean to tell me that in three hours or less the ship may be a wreck?"

"Will be," said Tollemache. "Have a cigar." And he passed a well filled case to his companion.

The American was beginning to take the silent one's measure. He bit off the end of a cigar and lit it.

"What's at the back of your head?" he asked coolly. The other looked toward the Chileans.

"Those chaps are rotters," he said.

"You think they will cut up rough? What can they do? We must all sink or swim together."

"Yes, but there are the women, you know. They must be looked after. You can count on me. Tell the chief steward and the padre."

Gray felt that here was a man after his own heart, the native born American having a rough and ready way of classifying nationalities when the last test of manhood is applied by a shipwreck or a fire.

"Got a gun?" he inquired.

"Cabin—going for it first opportunity."

"Same here. But the captain will give us some sort of warning."

"Perhaps not. Die quick, die happy."

Then Gray smiled, and he could not help saying, "Tell you what, cousin, if you shoot as straight as you talk these stewards will come to heel, no matter what happens."

"Fair shot," admitted Tollemache, and he stalked off to his stateroom, while the count was vociferating for the last time:

Quet bon p'lit ed c'etait ial
La, la!

Between Elsie and De Polnellit the chorus made quite a respectable din. Few noticed that the saloon main companion had been opened again until the sharp bark of a dog joining in the hand clapping turned every eye toward the stairway. Captain Courtenay was descending. In front ran Joey, who of course laughed that the plaudits of the audience demanded recognition. Courtenay had removed his pilskins before leaving the bridge. His dark blue uniform was flecked with white foam, and a sou'wester was tied under his chin; otherwise his appearance gave little sign of the wild turmoil without. Joey, on the other hand, was a very wet dog and inclined to be snappy.

"I regret to have to inform you," said Courtenay, with the measured deliberation of a man who has made up his mind exactly what to say, "that the ship has been disabled by some accident, the cause of which is unknown at present. The unfortunate result is that she is in a position of some peril."

There was a sudden stir among the Chilean stewards, whose wits were sharpened sufficiently to render the captain's statement quite clear to them. Isobel uttered a little sob of horror, and Mrs. Somerville gasped faintly, "Oh, my poor children!" Elsie, her lips parted, sat forward on the piano stool. Her senses seemed to have become intensified all at once. She could see everything, hear everything. Some of the Chileans and Spaniards crossed themselves; others swore. Count Edouard breathed hard and muttered, "Grand Dieu!" She wondered why the captain and Mr. Tollemache, who had returned from his stateroom and was standing in the half light of a doorway, should simultaneously drop their right hands into a coat pocket. Mr. Tollemache, too, gave a queer little nod to the American, who had moved near to Isobel and placed a hand on her shoulder. Elsie was quite sure that Gray whispered, "For goodness' sake, don't cause a scene!" And indeed he did ask Isobel and Mrs. Somerville, with some curtness, to restrain themselves.

Courtenay with one cold glance chilled into silence the muttered prayers and curses of the Chileans.

"It may be necessary about daybreak to endeavor to beach the ship," he continued. "I wish you all, therefore, to guard against possible exposure by wearing warm clothes, especially furs and overcoats. Money and jewelry should be secured, but no baggage of any sort need be carried, as all other personal belongings must be left on board. Passengers will gather here and remain here until I send one of the officers for them. The companion doors will not be closed again, but the decks are quite impassable. You hear for yourselves that they are momentarily swept by heavy seas."

He turned to the chief steward.

"Your men Mr. Malcolm," he said, "will begin at once, under your directions, to draw stores for each boat. There need be no hurry or excitement. We are as yet many miles distant from the nearest known land. If the wind changes or one of several possible things happens, the Kansas will suffer no damage whatever. I wish all hands to be prepared, however, for the chances—the remote chance, I trust—of the ship's being driven ashore, and I beg each one of you to remember that discipline and strict obedience to orders are not only more necessary now than ever, but also that they will be strictly enforced."

The concluding sentence was uttered very slowly and clearly. It was evident he meant the ship's company to understand him. Before any of his hearers attempted to [illegible] him he jammed the sou'wester on his head and ran up the stairs. The dog followed somewhat ruefully, the cozy saloon being far more to his liking than the wind swept, spray lashed chart house. Mr. Malcolm promptly stirred his myrmidons with a command to fall in by boats' crews, and Gomez won his chief's approval by quietly translating the captain's orders. Beyond Mrs. Somerville's subdued sobbing there was little outward manifestation that another crisis in the history of the Kansas and her human freight had come and gone.

CHAPTER IV.

As a little yeast leavens much flour, so does the presence of a few stout hearted men give strength and courage to a multitude. Although the rumor soon went the rounds that a giant wave which pooped the ship had carried away two of her six boats, there were no visible signs of flurry in the measures taken to equip the remaining boats for use. The men had confidence in their officers. Every one worked smoothly and well.

All told, there were eighty persons on board when the Kansas left Valparaiso. Of these, seventeen, including the officers, were of European birth or lineage. The remaining sixty-three were men of mixed nationalities, ranging from Spanish speaking Chileans to negroes. There were eight understewards, a cook and his assistants and nearly fifty sailors and firemen. Unfortunately the explosion of the stokehold had killed the chief engineer and one of his juniors, while six stokers were dead and several injured.

It was discovered that before he died the chief had shut off steam and thus prevented the accident from assuming far more serious proportions. The second engineer, a Newcastle man named Walker, who rushed to the engine room at the first indication of a mishap, found his chief lying in collapse on the lever platform. Walker promptly opened certain levers, which allowed the steam to escape freely; then he carried his comrade out of the spume to the deck. It was too late. Partial suffocation had placed too great a strain on a diseased heart. By the time Dr. Christobal was summoned a brave man was dead.

Courtenay, who had left instructions that he was to be called when the Evangelistas light was sighted, was sound asleep. In the elevated quarters assigned to the captain the noise of the explosion differed little from the thunderous blows of the sea, but the stopping of the engines awoke him instantly. He felt the ship lurch away from her course and saw the quick swerve of the compass indicator over his head. As he ran down the gangway leading from the bridge he heard the officer of the watch say:

"Something given way in the engine room, sir."

SIMPLE ROAD DRAG.

How to Make and Use One Composed of Railroad Iron.

these irons and bolt them with iron rods two and a half feet apart on one end and two feet on the other.

Hitch a horse to each end of this drag and drive the narrow end toward the ditch every time. This brings the dirt to the center of the road. By spiking a plank through the center one can ride on the drag. Drag the roads after rains as soon as the mud dries.

The Young Pigs.

Do not make the food too sloppy.

Keep plenty of charcoal in pen.

Castrate pigs at three weeks, not later.

Observe regularity in feeding and let them out for a run occasionally.

KEEPING UP HIGHWAYS

Government Bureau's Sound Advice on Road Drainage.

REMOVE ALL WATER QUICKLY.

That on Surface and Underground as Well—Center of Highway Should Be Raised—Size of Tiles and Laying Them Matters of Importance.

The United States office of public roads in Washington sent out the following bulletin regarding the proper manner of road drainage:

With an average of 27,000 tons of water falling in the form of rain on each mile of public road in the United States annually, it is scarcely to be marveled at that the ten commandments of the road builder can be summed up succinctly in the word "drainage." The saying has truth for a basis, as good drainage is the primary requisite for all roads. Even in sand roads this holds true, for there "good drainage" means such as will safely remove the storm water without erosion or gullying and still retain the surface moisture.

To obtain good drainage one must take into consideration both the surface water and the underground water. The surface water must be removed quickly and completely and without subjecting the road to excessive scour or erosion. For this reason the center of the road should be raised, and the slope toward the side ditches should be from one-half to one inch to each foot distance, or so that the water will run freely to the side ditches and not flow down the road or remain in puddles on the roadway. The side ditches should be of ample size to care for the severest storms, with a fall of not less than six inches in each hundred feet. Frequent, ample cross drains should be constructed and every opportunity taken to get the water away from the road as quickly as possible. Any road along which you see water standing in the side ditches or on which puddles of water have collected or which has been badly gullied and eroded by the rains has poor drainage and is in need of immediate attention. In fact, earth roads nearly always require a little attention after each rain.

The split log drag is essentially a tool to maintain good drainage on our earth roads and should be used after each rain. On a heavy clay or gumbo soil the drag when properly used tends to puddle the road surface, keep it free from ruts, dense, smooth and hard, thus securing the best surface drainage possible.

But in many places the underground water is too near the surface and must be removed before a good road will be possible. This means that some form of subdrainage must be resorted to, usually tile drains or clay or concrete. Water from whatever source must be got rid of effectively. As water in freezing expands one-eighth its volume, the road heaves out of shape, and when the ice melts the road disappears beneath the rising tide of mud constantly fed by rains, melting snows and underground springs.

In seepy and boggy places the subdrainage in order to be fully effective should lower the water level to not less than three feet below the road surface. If tiles are used they should be carefully laid, true to grade. Most failures in tile drainage can be attributed to carelessness in laying or too flat grade. Tile less than four inches in diameter should rarely be used, nor should a grade of less than six inches to the hundred feet be used unless absolutely necessary. In a very dense soil it is always advisable to cover the tile to at least a depth of six to twelve inches with a coarse sand or fine gravel. Care should always be taken to procure a free outlet for the drains and to protect the outlet with a concrete bulkhead or catch basin, which can always be kept clean and the outlet free.

The kind of tile to be used depends on local conditions. Concrete tile if properly made is quite as good as clay tile. Which kind to use is entirely a local question of dollars and cents. If concrete tile can be made more cheaply than clay tile can be had, use concrete; if not, use clay tile.

EVILS OF POOR ROADS.

Cost of Hauling Cut In Half by Good Highways.

The average cost of carrying a ton of goods a mile by lake is eight-tenths of a mill and by rail 7 1-16 mills. The average cost of carrying a ton of goods a mile on first class roads is said to be 7 cents and on common country roads 25 cents.

The latest report (made by the department of agriculture for 1904) shows 2,151,570 miles of public roads in the United States, of which 7.14 per cent were improved. In old, populous and rich states, such as New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois and Michigan, improvements were reported on less than 10 per cent of the public roads.

Almost every pound of freight originating upon or destined to a farm moves over a country road, most of it over a "common" country road, at a cost some three times as high as it would be if the road were first class. Sometimes the goods actually pay a heavier toll for a few miles' carriage between railroad station and farm than for all the remainder of the journey.

The railroads themselves spend millions to clip off 1 or 2 per cent from operating expenses here and there, and if farmers were presented with a feasible scheme for reducing their railroad freights, even one-quarter, they would feel that there indeed was a burning issue.

Road improvement receives much more attention than formerly, but much less than it deserves.

Importance of Good Roads.

Delaware county, Pa., is furnishing an illustration of the part smooth highways is going to play in general freight traffic in the near future. Thousands of dollars' worth of goods that until recent years were hauled by the railroads are now delivered direct from the stores or from the farms to the cities. Motor wagons are penetrating the farming districts and taking freights from the farmer's door to the city market and bringing back purchases by the same method. In short, good roads will be the leading factor in determining the mooted question of freight rates.

Five Hundred Charlevoix County Patrons Will go to Traverse City in 1909

Horton's Bay Grange No. 833.

Horton Bay Grange No. 833 met in regular session at grange hall Friday evening, April 16, and was opened in form by Past Master George Long, in the absence of Worthy Master Athur VanAmburg.

The lecturer's hour is observed in various ways. The young people all take great interest in helping and with our increase in membership the past year, we have a line order now.

March 5, twenty-two members of Resort grange, Emmet county, with Ed Bolsford, lecturer, gave Horton Bay grange a fine program. It was greatly enjoyed by all. After grange closed we served refreshments. April 1, fifteen of our members went over to Resort grange and gave a program, after which we were served to a fine supper. We all enjoyed the evening very much and think if more granges would exchange programs they would be benefitted in many ways. We get new ideas, get acquainted and we have more interest in the order. It is a great help to dormant granges. Maple Grove grange has visited our grange several times and we are grateful to them. One year ago last August Pomona grange met with us and as only five outside of our own members came, it was discouraging to say the least.

Grange meets the first and third Friday evenings of each month. The next meeting will be held May 7, when the following program will be given.

Song, by the grange.

Roll call. Responded to by the ladies with useful things for the housewife to know. The men will tell what new seeds or plants they will try in the garden this spring.

Instrumental music, Ollie VanAmburg.

Recitation, J. C. Wallace.

Reading, Mrs. George Long.

Song, No. 175, Grange Melodies.

Reading, Blanch Wallace.

Short talks on "How we can improve our grange," by all the members.

Solo, Josie Slott.

Music, Miss Eckstrom.

All that attended the grange social at Mrs. Wallace's Friday night report a fine time, but on account of bad roads the attendance was small.

Wilson Grange No. 719

Wilson grange met Saturday April 24, with an attendance of about thirty-five. Four visitors were present from South Arm.

After the business session, in which two candidates received instructions in the third and fourth degrees, a short program and a long supper were thoroughly enjoyed by the members.

During the course of the degree work the South Arm members gave us an object lesson in parliamentary rules, which was much needed and well appreciated. 'Nuff sed.

P. S. Does South Arm need any instructions in the art of playing base ball?

South Arm Grange No. 815.

South Arm Grange met in regular session Saturday evening May 1, 1909. All officers present except worthy chaplain.

The committee on seeds reported that they had procured seeds for grange exhibit. These seeds are of vegetables not commonly grown in the farm garden, and are paid for by the grange and distributed among the members who select the best for the grange exhibit.

After some discussion a motion was made and carried to buy proper regalia and each member be decorated with the same before being allowed to enter the hall. Moved and carried, to have a dance next Friday evening. Bros. Jas. Nice, Frank Kiser and Reuben Murphy were appointed as a committee on the dance.

Recess, after which lecturer's hour was carried out with recipes by four of the sisters of the grange. They each passed a plate of cookies to prove the recipes were all right. We certainly have some good pastry cooks in our grange. We also had a contest. It consisted of the members taking equal sides and passing an equal number of clothes pins down the line and return, handling only one at a time. This resulted in a controversy as to who won, so the brothers went against the sisters in the same contest. The brothers won. Grange closed in form.

We were agreeably surprised to read in the grange column that the next Pomona meeting would be held at South Arm Grange. Now we have always wanted Pomona in June but we are inclined to lay it to the editor of the grange column and to think it too good to be true. However if it is true, come along and we'll be there. (The memory of the good time at South Arm Pomona caused the editor to go wrong but don't forget we'll be with you at the special in September.)

Marion Center Grange No. 956.

Marion Center grange met in regular session April 28 with all officers present but master, gatekeeper and organist. The worthy master got stuck in the mud with his auto and had all the grange he wanted getting it extracted.

Worthy overseer Paquette presided in the absence of the master. The usual order of business was transacted. The grange voted to complete the hall by painting the woodwork both outside and inside. Arrangements were made for the entertainment of Pomona in June.

The lecturer furnished a short program.

DON'T BE BALD.

W. C. T. U. DEPARTMENT

Conducted by the local W. C. T. U.

At last, after a long drawn out struggle of more than three years, the committee of fifteen citizens who were elected to frame a new charter for "beautiful Berkeley" has been prevailed upon to insert an alternative clause, giving the citizens opportunity to vote yes or no on a no-license proposition and the citizens have voted yes.

The agitation for a prohibition clause was commenced when the committee was first elected. The sentiment grew and grew with increasing momentum. Much enthusiasm was kindled by the fiery editorials of the splendid Berkeley Gazette, our strong, up-to-date reform paper.

On the day before the election which was to decide the fate of the new charter, the whole town seemed alive with men, women and children wearing the talismanic badges, "Vote yes on the no-license clause." "Keep the saloons out." "This is a city of women and children; vote for us."

The liquor forces feigned indifference until the morning of election, when the citizens awoke to find the sidewalks strewn with literature bearing the slogan, "Vote no on the no-license clause," and similar sentiments, and the liquor advocates fought all day for saloons.

But the decent element was on its mettle and worked early and late for the clause which would forever bar the vile crime factories from the college town, and as a result the charter proper (which is a model document) carried six to one, and the no-license feature two to one, which is a glorious vindication for our cause.

Great is the rejoicing today, not only here, but all over our state, for this is the educational center of California.

A word of explanation anent conditions here may not be amiss: Eight years ago some two score saloons were ranged outside the "mile limit" around the state university. They were a constant thorn in the flesh of the decent class of citizens, and a determined campaign against them resulted, after a fiercely contested battle, in voting them out by popular ballot, which compelled our town trustees to give us a no-license ordinance.

This was in force one year, when the trustees, for some unknown reason, by a majority of one repealed that ordinance—despite the clamorous protest of a large majority of citizens—and instituted in its place a law allowing saloons to resume their old sway.

The righteous indignation of the people, men and women, knew no bounds; and from that day on it has never slumbered. The W. C. T. U., which was a strong factor in the fight from the first, vowed that "saloons must go" from Berkeley, and together with the good men, never relaxed its vigilance, but kept stirring up the agitation until at last, seemingly worn out with the friction, the board voted out the last saloon and the town again went "dry."

Then a new charter was proposed a committee was elected to frame it. The opportunity was siezed upon to induce that body of men to insert a no-license clause in the document. The editor of the Gazette was consulted and the plan was unfolded in his sanctum and the ball set to rolling, which gathered momentum as it went, until after many backsets and discouragments the present glorious victory for righteousness has been achieved.

Now, no difference what may be the private sentiment of ever-changing excise boards, they can never inflict the curse of saloons upon this university town again. The fundamental law says: "No."

Rejoice with us, all towns and cities wrestling with the vexing saloon problem, and "go thou and do likewise."

Russian Vengeance.

The Russian revolutionaries have absolutely no mercy on those who betray them. It is well known that in the year 1903 a traitor caught at Odessa was bricked up alive in a cellar.

Regnier, a French spy in the pay of the Russian police, for a long time eluded the vengeance of the revolutionaries. But they caught him at last, and that just at the moment when he fancied himself safe. His body was found in his cabin on a ship which reached Antwerp. He had been suffocated by fumes of sulphureted hydrogen. How this was done was never discovered.

The Considerate Clock.

"One kiss!" pleaded a departing lover.

"Nonsense!" exclaimed his fiancee in a teasing mood. "Some one might see us."

"Who?"

"Why, the clock; it has a face."

"Yes, but it keeps its hands in front of it!"

I Make and Repair Harness

With years of experience in making and repairing harness, you can depend on my workmanship. Of course you can get harness made and repaired by others, perhaps just as good, perhaps not. When I am through with a job, there's no "perhaps" about it.

I use the very best oak tanned leather and I take no chances when I guarantee my harness.

NORTH MICHIGAN PRESS CLUB MEET

At Petoskey Thursday and Friday of Last week.

MOST SUCCESSFUL IN ITS HISTORY

Subjects Were All Discussed In Lively Manner

Resolutions Adopted. Next Meeting at Manistee. Spring Meeting at Elk Rapids. Harley New President

The North Michigan Press club held one of the most interesting sessions of its history at Petoskey Thursday and Friday of last week.

Thursday afternoon the members of the club were given an automobile ride and shown the sights of Petoskey and Harbor Springs.

Thursday evening the meeting was called to order by President Churchill, of the Petoskey News, with J. B. Haskins, of the Howard City Record, secretary. After reading several letters from absentees, Mayor Reycraft welcomed the visitors to the city, the response being given by George W. Perry, of the Elk Rapids Progress.

The subject of government competition with country printers was the first subject discussed and a committee was appointed to draft a memorial to congress looking to a remedy of the evil.

O. E. Hawkins, of the Mancelona Herald, gave a short address on what protection should be given the local business man from outside competition. The general impression was that space should be sold to all comers. Legal advertising was discussed in a vigorous manner, "Does Political Advertising Pay?" by J. B. Haskins created great discussion.

The meeting closed by what is always a feature of the meetings of the club, an address by J. B Ribbett, of the Rapid City Rustler.

Friday morning the club got down to business with Herbert Hafley, of Manistee, as secretary. A paper on, "The Business Man who does not Believe in Advertising," by A. R. Canfield, of the Clare Conrier, was read and fully discussed. "Lotteries and the Way to Obey the Law, and Convince Patrons they Ought to," was thoroughly discussed and all agreed that no newspaper had any right, under the law, to publish any notice of any drawing, rafile or the like under any circumstances.

The carrying of churches and church societies on the free list was discussed and all agreed it was poor policy.

J. N. Tinklepangh, of the Kalkaska Leader, took up the subject of easing the grind in country newspaper offices and gave some very good pointers.

The committees on resolutions and memorals were then called for, and responded with the following resolutions:

Whereas, the members of this association appreciate the hospitality of the citizens of the city of Petoskey as extended them on the occasion of their annual meeting May 6 and 7, 1909, and fully recoguize that "There's Only One Petoskey," whose reputation as a resort city is almost world wide, and whose fame as an energetic and enterprising community is too well known to demand extended mention.

And, Whereas, we recognize that every effort has been put forward to make our meeting profitable and our stay in the city pleasant.

Therefore Be It Resolved, That the members of the North Michigan Press club feel under obligations for the efforts put forth on their behalf, and tender their thanks to the press of the city for work done in making this meeting successful; to the retiring officers for their work during their incumbency; to the M. E. church society for kindly tendering the use of their church edifice for the sessions of the association; to the county for the use of the court room; to George S. Rice, George B. McManus, Chalmers Curtis, John L. A. Kalster and Heber Curtis for tending the members an automobile ride about the city and the neighboring resorts; Prof. M. O. Graves and other members of the committee of the Petoskey and Emmet County Improvement association for favors and entertainment; to George Dale Gardner for souvenirs, to Will L. McManus for courtesies extended at the Cushman House and all the citizens who entertained to the success of the meeting.

We assure all that it will be a privilege to return the courtesies shown by extending the fame of the city of Petoskey.

GEORGE W. PERRY,
O. E. HAWKINS,
Committee.

Resolution addressed to the members of congress from Michigan:

Resolved, that we, the members of the North Michigan Press club in meeting assembled at Petoskey, May 6 and 7, 1909, are strictly opposed to the policy of the United States postoffice department in printing return cards on envelopes in competition with the printers of the country, and hereby request that the senators and representatives of Michigan do all in their power to pass legislation in accord with this resolution, and that a copy of this resolution be mailed to each such senator and representative.

A. L. GRAYSON,
ELMER E. WHITE,
HERBERT HARLEY,
Committee.

The following were present and participated in the sessions of the club during its two days' session:

A. J. Usher, Charlevoix COURIER; Herbert Harley, Manistee Daily News; A. G. Grayson, Pellston Journal; Elmer E. White, Traverse City Eagle; J. N. Tinklepangh, Kalkaska Leader; George W. Perry, Elk Rapids Progress; O. E. Hawkins, Mancelona Herald; J. W. Hallack, Thompsonville News; Lee North, Petoskey Record; J. B. Haskins, Howard City Record and the Michigan Bulletin; J. R. Riblett, Rapid River Rustler; C. E. Churchill, Petoskey Evening News; Glen A. Whipple, Kalkaska Leader; H. S. Babcock, Harbor Springs Graphic.

The last act of the club and just before adjournment for dinner was the election of officers and selection of a place for the next meeting. It was decided to hold the next session of the club in the fall at Manistee, and the following spring meeting at Elk Rapids, and the following officers were elected: President, Herbert Harley of the Manistee Daily News; secretary, George W. Perry of the Elk Rapids Progress.

It was the consensus of opinion that this was one of the very best meetings the club has ever held, both from a point of the business end of the newspaper, and in a social way. Those who met the visiting brethren were pleased with them and all have been benefitted by the rubbing together.

FRUIT GROWERS ASSOCIATION

Held Well Attended Meeting at Central Lake April 30

The meeting of the Intermediate Valley Fruit Grower's Association held at Central Lake, April 30, was well attended although the weather was the most disagreeable of the year.

The program, as previously published was pulled off with the exception of one number. O. K. White, field agent of the Michigan Agricultural College, was present and took a prominent part in the discussions. It was voted to hold the meetings of the association, when practicable on the farms of the members and the next meeting will be held at the Heusstreet farm, the last Friday in May. For demonstration purposes the farm of O. E. Sage, route no. 1 Central Lake, was selected and Mr. White will visit the farm several times during the season for inspection and to direct the work of caring for the trees and fruit.

SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING

Of Meguzee Association Being Held at Central Lake.

The Meguzee Association representing lodges of the Eastern Star at Harbor Springs, Petoskey, Charlevoix, East Jordan, Boyne City Bellaire, Mancelona, Acme, Kalkaska, Elk Rapids, Traverse City and Central Lake are holding their seventh annual meeting at Central Lake to-day and to-morrow.

Each lodge is entitled to ten delegates. The officers of the Association are: President, Mrs. J. M. Harris, Boyne City; Secretary, Mrs. Anna Soules, Traverse City; Treasurer, Mrs. Myrtle Young, Charlevoix.

Mrs. W. E. Campbell will do dressmaking at her home on Antrim street. 18-4-f

CRAMTON-WARNER BILL

Passed by the Hoose Last Week With Few Changes

Will Probably Pass the Senate. Makes Many Changes in Present Law

The house passed the Cramton-Warner liquor regulation bill Thursday by the vote of 80 to 2, the two being Jensen, of Escanaba, and Beeman, of Cass. Few changes were made in the bill, and these of minor importance. One new clause provides that nobody with a penitentiary record shall conduct a saloon. The temperance people seemed satisfied that the bill was a genuine effort on the part of the liquor men to better liquor conditions and they gave it their support.

Representatives Beeman and Jensen were against the bill because it allows cities to permit saloons to stay open until 12 o'clock; but this is purely a matter of home rule. Under the general state law now all saloons must close at 9 o'clock unless the local councils extend the hour to 10 or 11. The bill passed yesterday allows an extention to 12. Jokingly, it was moved that Mr. Beeman be excused from voting. "I calculate I know how I want to vote," said he. "I think the saloon keepers have time enough now to fill a man full of 'hell' so he'll go home and lick his family, without extending the hours any."

The changes the bill contemplate are as follows:

The money to be paid to do business is designated as a license fee, instead of a tax, the schedule of fees being the same as now.

Druggists must not sell liquor except on a physician's prescription, and such prescription shall not be re-filled.

Only citizens of the United States can get a license.

Persons twice convicted of violating the liquor laws shall not be granted licenses, and neither shall ex-convicts.

No license shall be granted to a woman.

The general law for closing is to be 9 o'clock, although city councils and village trustees may extend the closing hour to midnight.

No new saloon shall be opened within 400 feet of a church or a school without the consent of every one of the property owners within 300 feet of the proposed saloon.

No additional licenses shall be granted in any municipality or township except at a ratio of one for each five hundred increase in population.

The matter of creating "dry" resident districts in cities is taken care of in the home rule charter bill.

PRIMARY SCHOOL MONEY

VICTORS IN BOTH GAMES

Charlevoix Boys Have Won all Games This Season

BELLAIRE, PETOSKEY AND BOYNE CITY

Saturday Games Were Good Snappy Sportsmanlike Contests

Harbor Springs Next Saturday—Will be Good Game—Defeated in Spelling Match at Boyne City

The first ball game of the season on the home grounds, was played between Petoskey and Charlevoix High School teams Saturday forenoon, Charlevoix winning, in a good clean fast game, by a score of 9 to 7, in the eighth inning.

The visitors were in the lead for the first part of the game, the locals being handicapped by some of their best players being at the fire. In the latter part, however, they took the lead by making good clean hits. The game was a fine exhibition of good, clean playing throughout each side playing the game in a sportsmanlike manner. Batteries, Petoskey, Varnum and Weaver; Charlevoix, Powers and Small.

In the afternoon the boys went to Boyne City and defeated the Boyne City team in another well fought game, on slippery grounds, by a score of 3 to 2. Powers and Small again doing service for the locals.

In the evening the spelling match was called off between a picked team of twenty-five from each school. After an hour's contest, twenty-three from Boyne City were left standing and only sixteen from Charlevoix, Boyne City winning by a percentage of 92 to 64.

Next Saturday the locals will meet the Harbor Springs team on the home grounds. As Harbor Springs has a fast team a snappy contest is looked for. Game will be called at 9:30 a. m. as the track team will go to Boyne City in the afternoon.

OVER 89 THOUSAND DOLLARS

Loss in Charlevoix County by Forest Fires Last Fall

According to the Estimate of State Game Warden Pierce

After the forest fires in Michigan last fall an expert from the government at Washington, was sent out to investigate, and reported the loss was $44,000,000. State Game Warded Pierce now states that the estimate of the Washington expert was wrong, his estimate gathered from the reports of supervisors in organized townships, fire wardens and lumber owners in Northern Michigan, making the loss $2,570,140. The loss, given by Warden Pierce, in Charlevoix and neighboring counties is as follows:

Antrim	$120,875
Charlevoix	89,315
Kalkaska	186,500
Leelanau	3,650
Emmet	72,150
Otsego	283,950

WILLIAM DODD DEAD

Had Been a Resident of Marion Township Several Years

William Dodd, a well known and highly respected resident of Marion township, died at his home in that township Wednesday, after an illness of over eighteen months.

Mr. Dodd moved to this region from Shelby, Michigan, about eight years ago, locating first at Phelps, where he lived for two years, moving from there to the farm in Marion where he died.

He leaves besides his wife, two daughters, Mrs. Alonzo Rice of Shelby and Mrs. Arthur Wooley of Charlevoix and one son, Earl.

The funeral was held at the house Thursday, Rev. Dr. Wright assisted by Rev. Tilliton officiating. Burial at Brookside.

The Majestic Theatre is giving an exceptionally good show this week—one you can't afford to miss. Remember if you want to receive the gold piece you must be present when your name is called Saturday night. 1901

WOMAN KILLED AT GAYLORD

Was Confused and Tried to Cross the Track in Front of a Train

While attempting to cross the main line of the Michigan Central at Gaylord Wednesday afternoon of last week, Mrs. Bishop, the mother of a local teamster in that town, was struck by the south bound passenger train right near the depot and instantly killed. Several freight trains which were using the side tracks, switching cars back and forth evidently confused the old lady, and in her hurry to get across the tracks to the depot she did not notice the train approaching on the main line, and was hit by the pilot beam of the locomotive with such force that she was thrown over the side track and when witnesses could get to the scene she was dead. She was about sixty years of age and leaves one son at Gaylord.

Conductor Buellow of the local passenger train, who was an eye witness to the scene, says the passenger train, which was slowing down for the regular stop at the depot, was not moving over six miles an hour, and the engineer was able to bring his train to a standstill immediately. The warning whistle was also blown as soon as the woman was seen on the track, but in her confusion, she did not get out of the way. Her funeral was held Friday.

WELL ATTENDED

Was the Union Temperance Meeting at Baptist Church

Able Address by City Attorney Fitch—Officers Will be Assisted.

The Union Temperance Meeting held at the Baptist church Sunday night, under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., was well attended the church being packed. The meeting was presided over by Rev. H. A. Putnam.

Mrs. H. P. Parmalee read a paper on early history of the W. C. T. U., which was very interesting. After a solo by Harker Kirby, City Attorney Fitch gave an address on law enforcement. Mr. Fitch explained that in a vast number of cases public officials were unjustly critizied for non-enforcement of the laws, owing to the difficulty of securing sufficient evidence to warrant them in begining prosecutions; that concerted action and proper organization in assisting the officials instead of spasmodic efforts were of vast benefit to the officials and also would create a more wholesome regard for the law from the lawbreakers; that there were other laws, which should be looked into, as well as the local option law; that the local option law would be enforced, as our officials were vigilant, the liquor dealers themselves had accepted the verdict in a proper spirit and had shown a disposition to abide by the new order in a cheerful manner. Mr. Fitch received many compliments for the able and unbiased manner in which he handled his subject, and, at the conclusion, it was voted to routine the local option campaign committee as a law and order committee to assist the prosecutor in securing evidence, when needed, for violations of the law if any occur in this city.

Not the least entertaining feature of the evening were the songs by Drs. A. M. and F. H. Wilkinson, Harker Kirby and the Baptist church choir.

The Importance of Soil Conditions as a Preventive

Other Means of Prevention Given, Which Will Aid the Farmer in Producing Potatoes.

What it is. Potato scab is a fungus growth on the skin of the potato. From this fungus grow spores which live over winter in the soil and on the tuber in storage. Therefor, planting scabby seed generally (but not always) results in a scabby crop. The soil which has produced scabby potatoes is almost sure to produce a scabby crop if planted with potatoes again the following season.

Killing the scab on the seed. When potatoes are to be planted on land free from scab the seed tubers should be disinfected to prevent the introduction of the disease by means of scab spores on the seed; but if the land has already been infected this is of little use. Disinfection may be accomplished in different ways—by soaking the seed in corrosive sublimate solution or in a formalin or by exposing it to formaldehyde gas.

Corrosive sublimate treatment. Make a solution containing one ounce of corsosive sublimate in seven gallons of water. Soak the tubers in this for 1½ hours. This treatment has been largely superceded by the formalin treatment which is equally effective, more convenient and safer. Corrosive sublimate is very poisonous.

Formalin treatment. Into 30 gallons of water pour one pint of formalin (40 per cent formaldehyde.) Soak the uncut tubers in this solution for two hours. The same solution may be used several times. Take care that the treated tubers are not re-infected by coming into contact with bags or crates which have held scabby potatoes. It is better to make this treatment only a few days before planting. Formalin is not poisonous. Treated seed not needed for planting may be used for food or fed to stock with safety.

Importance of soil conditions. Scabby potatoes are more common on clay or loam than on sandy soil. These soils are more apt to be acid, and on acid soil scab is not common. The scab fungus does not thrive in this kind of soil. Soils which are neutral or slightly alkaline are most favorable to scab. Unfortunately, the soil conditions most favorable to large yields are also most favorable to the growth of the scab fungus.

Lime, ashes and stable manure. Putting lime, wood ashes or stable manure upon the potato field tends very much to increase the trouble with scab. These substances lessen the acidity of the soil and thereby make it more favorable for the growth of the fungus which may be in the soil. They do not cause the scab as some believe, simply to make favorable conditions for its growth.

Use of green crops and fertilizer. By plowing under some green crop like clover or rye a soil that has become alkaline may be brought back to an acid condition. This is some help but cannot be relied upon to entirely prevent scab. An application of sulphate of ammonia will reduce the loss from scab as well as supply plant food.

Rotation of crops. A rotation of crops will assist, considerably, in the control of scab. On soil badly infested with scab it is usually cheaper to abandon potato culture for a time than to try and combat the disease.

Scab may persist in soil several years just how long is unknown. Much depends on the treatment of the soil and kind of crops grown. Probably, the time is shorter in tilled land than in sod. Beets harbor scab; so do turnips probably.—H. J. EUSTACE, Horticulturist.

James Fox is having a new veranda added to his house.

Albert West sold a fine young cow last week to a Mr. Connelly.

John Leisl, jr., will act as juror in the circuit court from our town this week.

William Leismer has been suffering greatly with the asthma for the last three weeks.

Mrs. James Dilworth and Miss Helen Dilworth were Petoskey visitors last Friday.

Rev. Bridgewater and Rev. Perrone dined with Mrs. Mary Bewell and daughters last Saturday.

The Bible Study class met at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Koteskey, jr., last Friday evening.

Owing to the cold and stormy weather the work on Ale Barkley's new barn is progressing slowly.

Hiram Starmer is also having a new well completed with an excellent supply of good water promised.

Mrs. Homer Conrad, of Boyne City, accompanied her father, Mr. Call, to his home last Friday evening.

Rev. Frank Bridgewater, pastor of the Methodist church here, gave his people a Thursday evening sermon last week.

Mrs. Mary Bewell accompanies Rev. Bridgewater on his pastoral calls last Friday to William Buell's and Albert West's.

F. Wesley Dilworth, who has been employed in the city of Detroit since last November will return to his home in Horton Bay May 17.

Mr. Coleman and family are anticipating an extended visit from Mr. Coleman's brother and his wife, and his sister and her husband from Canada very soon.

Joe Taylor has had a new drive well put in on his farm upwards of 102 feet in depth with a promising supply of good water. Mr. Wyatt, of Boyne City, is the contractor.

John Dilworth, who has been visiting his brother and family here, returned to his home in Detroit last Tuesday. Miss Helen Dilworth will extend her visit for about two months.

Mr. Gibson, of North Bay, made a trip to our town last week and reports his son, Rev. Clyde Gibson, as being pleasantly located on his new field of labor at Nashville, Michigan.

Many of our farmers are receiving their contract peas and beans this week, Frank Coleman perhaps being the heaviest contractor, having contracted for one hundred and seventy bushels of peas.

Mrs. Stroud and Mrs. Misenar entertained the Women's Home Missionary society last Thursday afternoon. A good many were in attendance. Mrs. Fred and Mrs. Arthur Sneathen will entertain at the next meeting.

Mr. Swift and six of his Beulah Home boys rendered an interesting program at the Evangelical church last Sunday evening. They had nearly a full house and raised about thirty-five dollars in cash and subscriptions.

Friday night the devil was sick,
Well you, that he fell bad,
Because so many saloons were closed,
The greatest delight he had.

Was in working the rubber of men and boys,
And women and girls as well,
And when the saloon is humming with noise,
It sounds like a place, I can't tell.

But the prospect of closing so many saloons,
Made the old fellow feel very ill,
For there would not be so many poor souls,
Kept busy pouring down swill.

COUNTY NORMAL NOTES.

Among the early birds in the spring, three species of woodpeckers are noticeable, the red-headed, the downy and the hairy woodpecker. The red-headed is easily recognized from its bright red head, black wings and white body. The downy is about the size of the sparrow and is black and white, the hairy woodpecker is about the size of a robin and has also black and white markings. None of these woodpeckers are sap-suckers though the downy likes the soft inner bark of the apple and maple trees and bores holes in the trees to enjoy this sweet inner bark. The occasional injury done in this way is more than paid for by the immense good all of these woodpeckers do as insect eaters. The downy is particularly valuable to the orchardist and tree lover, because he works throughout the fall and winter seeking out and devouring the insects that would otherwise live over.

ROADMAKING WITH OIL

Method of Construction Valuable For Dirt and Macadam.

PRACTICALLY SELF HEALING.

Oiled Highways Are Not Only Dustless, Mudless and Noiseless, but They Improve With Use—Oil Makes Roads Firm, but Not Hard.

In the opinion of H. T. Snell, who has made a study of city and country roads in twenty states in the last year, more good roads will be built in Kansas during the next twelve months than in any other state in the Union. Mr. Snell investigated road conditions for the Standard Oil company. The big trust is seeking a market for its surplus of oil left after the more valuable products have been taken from it. The surplus oil is now sold chiefly for fuel.

"The company expects to build a mile of good road near the State Agricultural college at Manhattan, Kan.," Mr. Snell said. "We expect to show by the experiment that an oiled road whether built with earth or crushed rock, is not only the most durable, but in the end is the most economical.

"In every state there is annually spent millions of dollars in building new roads. In few cases is any considerable sum spent on the roads to preserve them. Oiled roads are not only dustless, mudless and noiseless, but they are practically 'self healing'—that is, they improve with use. The dirt and oil roads give horses good footing, while the tires of the vehicles 'iron out' the hoof marks."

Experiments made on Kansas City boulevards and on roads in Jackson county, which were coated with oil, have been watched by men and organizations interested in good roads. The use of oil on boulevards and roads in Jackson county was among the earlier experiments in its use. Adopted for use to prevent dust, it was found that oil also is a preservative. In his report to the board of park commissioners on the use of oils on Kansas City boulevards, W. H. Dunn, superintendent of parks, said the results were "remarkable."

The city paid an average of 77½ cents a barrel of forty-two gallons for the oil. An area equal to 1,010,560 square yards was oiled. The cost of oiling per square yard was slightly more than 1 cent, representing the oil, labor and supplies. The oil subdued dust. Had the same area been sprinkled with water to prevent dust the cost would have been 2.4 cents per square yard. Mr. Dunn estimated that the cost of sprinkling the area oiled last summer would have been $16,207.32. The expense of oiling this area was $10,671.44. The direct saving in using oil was $5,538.88, or 31 per cent. The indirect benefit followed in a marked saving in the cost of maintaining the boulevards and the uniform excellence of their condition.

Good roads naturally are a rural problem. In the cities no progress can be made unless the thoroughfares used for business and pleasure are paved and maintained in good condition. Country towns are concerned as much with good roads as are the farmers who use them. In country towns business practically is at a standstill in rainy seasons. Bad roads keep the farmers at home. If the farmer had a fit thoroughfare to the village he could do his trading on days when he could do no tasks in the fields. It is far more desirable that the farmer should visit his nearest town in the rainy season than at any other time, as the commodities he has to sell command the highest prices when rain keeps him at home.

The regents of the Kansas State Agricultural college were among the first of the governors of agricultural colleges in the United States to realize the vital concern which good roads are to farmers. Not only was there the feature of poor roads following rain, but there was the every day feature of ruts, pools and poor roadbed generally.

The college board of regents named Albert Dickens to take charge of experimental road work in Kansas. Mr. Dickens selected one-fourth of a mile of road west of the reformatory at Hutchinson to use in the first experiment. He reported upon the test as follows:

The soil was a fair sample of the sandy loam of the Arkansas valley. At the date of its selection no rain had fallen for 15 days. The sand was several inches deep. Loads consisting of fifty bushels of grain made an exceedingly heavy load for a strong draft team. A good carriage team required much urging to pull the carriage faster than a walk.

DIRT ROAD AFTER ONE OIL TREATMENT AND METHOD OF APPLYING THE OIL.

After the grading was completed and the roadbed was well formed where ills were required the entire road, one-fourth mile in length and thirty feet wide, was plowed to a depth of about four and one-half inches and thoroughly pulverized with a harrow and disk. A disk, set straight, was run before the oil sprinkling tank to open small furrows, and a harrow followed the oil sprinkling tank to thoroughly mix the soil and oil.

The oiling was done the first days of October. The oil was not heated. The tank of 500 gallons would cover about 8,800 square yards once. The harrow followed each application. When one gallon to each square yard had been applied the soil seemed nearly saturated to the depth of the plowing, four and one-half inches. After harrowing the last time a heavy float was used to smooth the surface. In a week the road was solid enough to allow rolling. A twelve ton roller was used, going over the road several times until it seemed to be thoroughly firm. After a week the road was used by all kinds of traffic. It was firm, but not hard. A sharp shod horse left the rails planks plainly outlined, but did not tear up the soil even when driven at a quick trot.

One reason for building the road in the fall was to note the effect of freezing weather. The road was not seriously affected. It seemed that the coating of oil had kept the underlying soil sufficiently dry to prevent serious heaving by frost.

Mr. Dickens ended the report by saying that the road is in good condition. Under his direction roads also were built near the Agricultural college in black loam; at Maple Hill, in the Mill creek valley, in soil known as "gumbo," at Garden City, in "as bad a stretch of road as can be found anywhere," being of sand, which absorbed the oil in places to a depth of sixteen inches, and the race track at Manhattan, which was said to have been improved so much that a widely known trainer of horses, C. B. Mitchael, terms it a "first class training track."

The cost of the roads varied from $525 to $1,300 a mile. Mr. Dickens reported. The average cost of a road eighteen feet wide, three miles from the railroad delivering the oil, is placed by Mr. Dickens at $600.

The oil used for roadmaking purposes embodies a quantity of asphalt. The California oil is best for the purpose, Texas oil ranks next, with Kansas third. The eastern oils have a base largely paraffin. They must be treated and asphalt added to make them useful in roadmaking.

With proper construction and the use of oil as a binder for dirt and macadam roads the farmers virtually may have asphalt roads past their homes, declare advocates of this method of road construction.—Kansas City Star.

Points For Swine Breeders.

A well regulated dip tank beats a mudhole.

Even fattening hogs appreciate a variety of feed.

Fattening the hog cheaper is making larger profits.

The poor fence invites the curious hog to try its strength.

Little pigs need plenty of room to exercise and to develop their muscles.

Cooking all the feed for hogs may not pay, but feed drinks are even more unprofitable.

A careful selection of breeding stock will do much to increase the profits in the hog business.

A good brood sow should be well kept. She is always producing a profit or preparing for it.

Clean Watering Troughs.

Sprinkle lime in your watering trough and not a particle of scum will form on the surface. When the lime loses its strength, scum will begin to form, which may be twice during a season. Wash out the trough and repeat the dose. It is cheap, harmless, wholesome, keeps the water sweet and saves the live stock.

Milly—I find this balm excellent for preserving the face.

Jessie—But why do you wish to preserve your face?

THE CAPTAIN OF the KANSAS

By LOUIS TRACY,

Author of "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," Etc.

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY EDWARD J. CLODE

CHAPTER II—Continued.

Several minutes elapsed before he or Walker, aided by willing volunteers, could penetrate the depths of the stokehold. The place was a charnel house, a stifling pit, filled with the charred contents of the furnaces, which gave off the most noisome fumes owing to the rapid condensation of steam and water escaping from the damaged pipes. But the gale raging without served one good purpose in driving plenty of air down the ventilating cowls. Gradually the choking atmosphere cleared. Courtenay was the first to reach the lowermost rung of the iron ladder, whence he looked with the eyes of despair on a scene of death and ruin.

The electric light was uninjured. It revealed the bodies of several men, either dead or insensible, lying amid the scattered coal. Shovels, stoking rods and pieces of iron plate had been hurled about in wild confusion. The door of one furnace was blown clean out of its bolts, furnace bars and fire bricks strewed the iron deck, while each time the ship rolled the heavy clank of loose metal somewhere in the engine room proved that the damage was not confined solely to the stokehold.

If Courtenay could have dropped quietly into the sea through the steel hull of the Kansas he would have welcomed the certain result of that bitter moment. But he was the captain, and men would look to him for salvation. Well, he would do all that was possible and, at any rate, die at his post. So, choking back his misery, he organized the work of rescue. Slings were formed of ropes, and those men in whom any signs of life were visible were the first to be lifted to the upper deck. The stokehold was quickly emptied of its inanimate occupants. Living and dead alike were carried to the untenanted second class saloon forward. Then Courtenay left Walker to solve the puzzle of the accident and report on its extent, while he climbed back to the bridge, there to tackle the far more pressing problem of the measures to be adopted if he would save his ship.

It was typical of the man that his first act was to wipe the grime of the stokehold off his face and hands. Then he drew a chart from the locker in which he had placed it two hours earlier. Mr. Boyle, who had been attending the signals both by siren and rocket, joined him. Courtenay pointed to a pin mark in the sheet.

"We were there at 6 o'clock," he said, and his voice was so steady that he seemed now to be free from the least touch of anxiety. "The course was south 10 east, and against this wind and sea, together with a strong current to the northeast, we would make eight knots under easy steam. Therefore by 8 o'clock, when the furnaces blew out, we were here."

He jabbed in a pin a little farther down the chart. Mr. Boyle grunted agreement.

"Huh!" he said.

Courtenay glanced at a chronometer. "It is now a quarter to 9," he went on, "and I reckon that since the ship swung round we have been carried at least six knots to the northeast."

"Huh!" growled Mr. Boyle again, but he bent a trifle nearer the chart. To his sailor's eyes the situation was quite simple. Unless by God's providence some miracle happened the Kansas was a doomed ship. The pin stuck where the admiralty chart recorded soundings of 100 fathoms with a fine sand bed. The longitude was 75.50 west of Greenwich and latitude 51.35 south. Staring at them from the otherwise blank space which showed the wide expanse of the Pacific was an ominous note by the compilers of the chart:

"Seamen are cautioned not to make free with these shores, as they are very imperfectly known, and, from their wild, desolate character, they cannot be approached with safety."

Right in the track of the drifting ship lay a vaguely outlined trio of dread import—"Breakers. Islet (coralline). Duncan rock." Behind this sinister barrier stood the more definite White Horse island, while, running due north and south a few miles away to the eastward, was a wavering dotted line which professed to mark the coast of Hanover island. Lending a fearful significance to the unknown character of the region, a printed comment followed the dotted line. "This coast is laid down from distant observations on board the Beagle." So the sea face of Hanover island had not been visited by civilized man for nearly sixty years!

Neither man spoke while their practiced scrutiny took in these details. The roaring chaos of the gale told what fate awaited them. The elemental forces had donned the black cap of the judge and sentenced them to speedy destruction.

Mr. Boyle pursed his lips. He looked sideways at Courtenay.

"Huh," he said. "What's to be done?"

"I propose," answered the captain coolly, "to endeavor"—

It was then that the giant wave leaped madly over the poop, as though the sea were resolved to swallow its prey without further warning. The second officer, outside on the bridge, had to cling to a stanchion for his life. Courtenay and Boyle saw two boats wrenched from their davits and carried overboard, while a bulkhead forward was smashed into matchwood. The half-caste quartermaster at the wheel muttered "Madonna!" and tried to remember a prayer.

"I propose," continued Courtenay, raising his voice so that the other might hear, "to give the ship steerage way by hoisting the foresail. Will you see to it? Then I intend to warn the passengers and make such preparations as are possible before we strike."

The second officer, outside on the bridge, had to cling to a stanchion for his life.

"Huh," agreed Mr. Boyle. He took the short cut over the rails. In a few seconds the captain heard a flow of oraide Spanish, and he knew that Mr. Boyle was getting the scared Chileans to work.

Then Courtenay went to his own cabin, in which, in the haste of his exit, he had imprisoned Joey. The dog received him with delight, for Joey knew a real gale from a "sham" one as well as any man before the mast. Courtenay patted his head, opened a drawer in the writing table and drew forth two photographs, which he kissed. He replaced them, locked the drawer and went out, letting the dog come with him. That was his farewell to his mother and sister. It was the first and last sign of sentiment he exhibited during that night of great endurance.

When he returned from the salon he found the chief officer examining the chart.

"Do you think we have any chance of making Concepcion strait?" he asked, pointing to the doubtfully marked channel which separates Hanover and Duke of York islands.

"If we set the mains'l we might bear up a bit."

"Try it."

"Huh," said Mr. Boyle, and he was off again into the spindrift.

Be it understood that the sails carried by a big vessel like the Kansas are of little practical value save under certain conditions of wind and sea, when they are rigged to steady her and thus give help to helm and propeller. Still, they might serve now to carry the ship a point or two toward the north, and this was the sole avenue of escape which remained.

Leaving the chart on the table, where it was secured by drawing pins, Courtenay went back to his cabin to obtain a pair of sea boots. Seeing Joey sitting on his tail and shivering, unable to indulge in a comfortable lick because the taste of salt water was hateful, he hunted for a padded mackintosh coat which he had procured for the dog's protection in cold latitudes. He ransacked two lockers before he found it. Several articles were tumbled in a heap on the floor in his haste, and he did not trouble to pack them away again. He buckled Joey into the garment, fastened his own oilskins and rejoined the second officer on the bridge. A glance showed him the dark wall of the mainsail rising abaft the after funnel. The quartermaster at the wheel, having recovered his wits, was keeping the ship's nose up to the wind by a steady pressure to port. The gale was as fierce as ever. The second officer shouted in Courtenay's ear:

"I am afraid, sir, the wind has shifted a point."

Courtenay looked at the compass. The ship was bearing exactly northeast. He had hoped that the sails would enable her to shape due north at least. Unquestionably some spiteful fiend was urging her headlong to ruin. Had the wind but veered as much to the south he might have chanced the run through Concepcion strait or even weathered Duke of York island. He nodded to his junior, whose presence on the bridge was a mere matter of form owing to the powerless condition of the ship and the impenetrable wraith of foam and mist that barred vision ahead, and strode off on a tour of inspection. As wind and sea were now beating more directly on the port side there was some degree of shelter along the covered-in deck to starboard. He found that two boats had been cleared of their lumber and lowered on the davits until they could be swung in on the promenade deck. The men were thus able to provision them more easily than in their exposed berths on the spar deck. He watched the workers for a few minutes, showed them how to stow and lash some biscuit tins more securely and continued his survey, meaning to look in on Walker and the doctor.

He had to pass the cabins set apart for the two girls. The ports were lighted, and through the window he could see some one peering out at him. Owing to the thickness of the glass and its blurred condition he could not tell whether the occupant was Elsie or Isobel or Isobel's maid; but, whoever it was, a hand seemed to signal to him to open the door.

He unfastened the bolts and held a half door slightly ajar. Joey, ever eager to be out of the pelting storm, hopped inside, and Courtenay heard Elsie exclaim:

"Good gracious, Joey! Where is your life belt?"

"Do you want anything?" asked Courtenay through the chink.

Elsie smiled at him. She was wrapped in a heavy ulster and had a tam-o'-shanter tied firmly on her head by a stout veil.

"Mr. Malcolm thought we had better bring life belts from our cabins. I came for mine, and I looked out and saw you. I wanted to ask you what had become of Dr. Christobal. I hope you don't mind."

"Not in the least. I am just going to him. Would you care to come?"

"Oh, I shall be most pleased!"

"He is attending the injured men, you know, and there are others there who are beyond his help."

"Perhaps I may be of some assistance."

"Come, then. When I open the door step out quickly and hold tight to that rail, and don't move until I tell you."

His manner was curt enough to please the superioress of a nunnery. Elsie was awed instantly by the glimpse she obtained of the flying scud within the narrow area of the salon lights, but she obeyed directions and presently found herself clinging desperately to the brass hand rail which ran breast high along the outer wall of her cabin. Then she felt an arm grip her tightly around the waist, and she heard a voice, which sounded as if it had traveled down a long corridor, shouting in her ear:

"Lean well back and trust to me! Let go!"

She had no idea that wind could blow like that, especially when the ship was going in the same direction. It shrieked and whistled and tore at the canvas side awnings with a vehemence that threatened to rip them from their stays. Courtenay held her glued to his left side, and there was something reassuring in the viselike grasp. She had a dim notion that he need not squeeze her quite so earnestly until she passed a gangway which led in the port side between the deck cabins and the music room. Then she changed her opinion. Were it not for the strong arm which held her she would have been blown into the sea.

To reach the forward salon they had to pass the boats near which

Courtenay had halted. The sailors saw them. During the first lull one of the men said:

"The senor captain is escorting one of the English senoritas from the salon."

"Where is he taking her to?" asked another.

"Who knows?"

"It will be all the same wherever she is. If the ship goes, we go."

"Who can tell? These English are stupid. They always try to save women first. Once when I was on the"—

A few words in Spanish reached them from Mr. Boyle, and they went on with their work. But such muttered confidences are eloquent of mischief when the pinch comes.

At the forward end of the promenade deck just beneath the bridge Elsie received another reminder of the force of the wind, which was rendered almost intolerable by the lashing of the spray.

"I—can't go on!" she gasped. Courtenay felt rather than heard that she was speaking to him. Without further ado he picked her up in his arms and deposited her, all flushed and breathless, in the shelter of the fore saloon hatch. If she were so anxious to see her friend the doctor, he was determined she should not be disappointed.

"No time for explanations," he said, while she trustingly clutched at a rail which gave support down the companionway. "Dr. Christobal is below, but I fear you will find a shocking scene. Perhaps you had better let me take you back."

"No, no; not on my account. I think I am past feeling any sentiment. I would far rather do something, be of some use, however slight."

A pungent smell of lobsform came to them up the hatchway. Joey, who had followed bravely in their wake and was now a few steps down the stairs, crept back, awed.

"At least let me ask Dr. Christobal if you may come. You will be quite safe here if you grip the rail. Even if a sea breaks over the hatch it cannot touch you. May I leave you? And do you mind holding Joey?"

Elsie detected a return to his earlier manner, and she was grateful to him for it. She did not like him so well when he was stern and curt.

"Yes," she said. "That is only reasonable, but please tell him I shall not be in the way. I know that there are wounded men to be attended and dead men down there too. I shall not scream or faint, believe me."

"I am sure of that. Not one woman in a thousand could have played and sung to cheer others as you did after the accident happened."

It might have been the reaction from her exciting passage along the deck, but Elsie experienced a sudden warm glow in her face. Somehow it was delightful to hear those words from such a man in the hour of his supremest trial, for she realized what it meant to him, even though his life were saved, if the Kansas became a wreck.

She stooped, ostensibly to grasp the dog's collar.

"Before you leave me," she said, "let me tell you how sorry I am for you."

He ran down the stairs and entered the small salon, which had been hastily converted into a hospital. Perhaps it would be better described as a mortuary, for it held more dead than living. Christobal, aided by two sailors, was wrapping flat around a fireman's seared arm. Happily there was an abundance of cotton sheets available, and the men tore them into strips. But the comparatively small supply of cotton wool carried in the ship's stores and in the doctor's private medicine chest had long since given out.

"Miss Maxwell is here. She asked me to bring her to you in case she might be able to render you some assistance," explained Courtenay.

Christobal drew himself upright, with the slowness of an elderly man whose joints are stiffening.

"Miss Maxwell here?" he repeated, obviously surprised, if not displeased. He waved a hand toward the men laid on mattresses on the deck. Most were quite motionless. Others writhed in agony. "She cannot come—it is impossible."

Every Little Saved Will Keep You Ahead

If you can't save ten dollars a month, save a hundred cents. One dollar saved is something ahead; it represents more than just that amount. The first dollar is doubly worth the effort. Each succeeding dollar saved requires less effort. Keep at it. Others have learned by experience that it pays to save.

The council having under consideration the matter of paving Michigan avenue, pursuant to the petition therefor filed with the city clerk and the city surveyor and street commissioner having made and presented a plat and diagram of such paving together with an estimate of cost thereof, Ald. Glassford offered the following resolution and moved its adoption:

Resolved, By the common council of the City of Charlevoix that the plat and dingram for the paving of Michigan avenue from Dixon avenue north and east to the north line of lot 13 of Crouter & Burns unrecorded plat of the City of Charlevoix together with the estimate of cost thereof as made by the city surveyor and street commissioner, be accepted and deposited with the city clerk for public examination.

Resolved further, That Thursday the 27th. day of May, 1909 at eight o'clock, p. m. be fixed as the date on which the council will meet in the council rooms to consider objections to said plat and diagram and estimate of cost of such proposed paving. Also,

Resolved further, That the city clerk be instructed and such officer is hereby instructed, to give notice of the filing and depositing of said plat and diagram and estimate of cost and of the proposed paving and of the district to be assessed, and of the time and place when the council will meet to consider objections thereto, by publication for at least two weeks in the Charlevoix COURIER, a newspaper, published and circulating in said city.

Adopted by aye and nay vote as follows: Ayes, Alds. Glassford, Rachow, Geiken and Webster.

Nays, None.

There being no further business the council adjourned.

G. E. DUTTON, City Clerk.

MRS MILLER IS DEAD

Was One of Charlevoix's Most Highly Respected Residents

Again it becomes the sad duty of the COURIER to chronicle the death of one of our best known and highly respected residents, Mrs. W. Herschel Miller, which took place at her home this morning at one o'clock of heart failure.

Mrs. Miller was born in St. Lawrence county, New York, forty-five years ago, and came with her husband to this city in 1890, where she has since resided.

She leaves besides her husband one son, Jason, a student in the University of Michigan.

AN ORDINANCE.

To provide for the licensing of persons, firms or corporations engaged in the construction of sidewalks in the City of Charlevoix, prescribing the manner of contracting for such construction and requiring bond therefor.

The Common Council of Charlevoix ordains:

Section 1. Every person, firm or corporation engaged to the construction of sidewalks in the City of Charlevoix, shall before entering upon the construction of any such walk, make and file with the city clerk an application in writing, stating the name of such person, or corporation and if a firm the name of the members thereof, the place of business and the length of time such person, firm or corporation has been engaged in the business of constructing cement or brick sidewalks, and that such person, firm or corporation desires to engage in such business in the City of Charlevoix and to receive the license therefor, and that such applicant will abide by and be governed by the rules, regulations and ordinances of said city respecting the building of sidewalks and the specifications therefor.

Section 2. Such applicant shall file with his application a bond to the City of Charlevoix in the sum of two thousand dollars with two good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the common council, conditioned for the full and faithful observance by the principal therein of all the rules, regulations and ordinances of said city relative to the construction of sidewalks and the specifications therefor; and also conditioned to indemnify and save harmless the said city from any and all loss, damages, suits, judgments, executions or other expense which may result or arise by reason of the failure or neglect of such person, firm or corporation, its agents or servants to comply with the rules, regulations and ordinances, or that may arise or result from the fault, neglect of carelessness of such person, firm or corporation, its servants or agents, in the prosecution of the work of construction; and also conditioned for the full and perfect performance by the obligor therein of the covenants and conditions of any and all contracts which such person, firm or corporation shall make or enter into with owners of property for the construction of sidewalks.

Section 3. Every such person, firm or corporation, before entering upon the construction of any sidewalk abutting on any lot or premises, shall make and enter into a written contract with the owner or owners of such lot or premises for the construction thereof, which contract shall provide that such sidewalk shall be constructed according to the specifications contained in the ordinances of the City of Charlevoix relating to sidewalks, stating the price to be paid therefor, the time within which the same is to be completed, and shall contain a proper warranty or guaranty of the contractor that such walk will not become defective within a period of two years from the date of completion and that should the same become defective within such period, not due to the fault or neglect of the owner thereof, such contractor will replace the same with a new walk or sections of walk free from defects.

Section 4. Before any application of a lot owner for a permit to build any sidewalk shall be approved or granted, such application shall be accompanied by a duplicate copy of the contract provided for in section 3 thereof.

Section 5. No bill, claim or account for the construction of any sidewalk shall be audited, allowed or paid in whole or in part, unless such walk was built by a licensed contractor as provided by this ordinance.

Section 6. The bond provided for by this ordinance shall inure to the benefit of any owner of a lot or premises and in the event of the default of any contractor in performing the covenants and conditions of any contract provided for herein such lot owner shall have the right to an assignment of such bond for the purposes of suing thereon for such default.

Section 7. Every person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of constructing sidewalks in the City of Charlevoix shall before the completion of any walk built by him, stamp or cause to be stamped, in a suitable place on the upper surface thereof, in plain, legible characters the name of such person, firm or corporation and the year in which the same was built. Such name and date shall be stamped once only on each walk abutting on any single lot or premises. Provided, that in case a portion only of the walk abutting on any single lot or premises is to be built, such name and date shall be stamped once on such portion so built.

Section 8. Upon the approval of the application for license as provided herein, a license shall be issued by the city clerk which officer shall collect therefor a license fee of one dollar for each license, and deposit the same with the city treasurer.

Section 9. All licenses shall expire on the first day of May next after the date of issue. Provided, that the expiration of any license shall not annul or terminate the bond provided for herein.

Section 10. This ordinance shall take immediate effect.

Adopted at a regular meeting of the common council held at the council rooms the 11th day of May, 1909.

O. E. WILBUR, Mayor.
G. E. DUTTON, City Clerk.

KING COAL.

While He Lives His Throne Is Fixed In the United States

The part played by coal in the world's affairs can well be illustrated by assuming the available supply to be suddenly cut off. The huge railroad systems of America would stop at once. So also would the electric power and lighting in all cities and suburbs. Steamship service would cease everywhere. Transit facilities would be dead. Factories, manufactories and shops would close down. Vast industries like steel, iron, copper, etc., would cease. Armies of laborers would be thrown out of work. Mails, schools, the navy, newspapers, foreign and internal trade—all would cease to exist. The trilogy governing commercial advance, heat, light and power, except a negligible amount of water, oil, etc., would be annihilated—all this until some other form of power could be developed. The possibility of such a cataclysm is not imminent, for coal will reign for some time yet and is destined to become a power whose capabilities have as yet been comparatively felt only more faintly than would a feather on the hide of an elephant.

The world needs coal. The United States has that coal to deliver. It will be wholly natural that so potent a necessity will make for continued peace and understanding among the powers of the world.

The coal mines of Europe are sunk about 3,000 feet deep. Coal is still being quarried on the banks of the Ohio, and the mines of Europe are nearing the limit of commercial possibility. The manufacturing supremacy of the old world is passing to the new. Coal is king, and while he lives his throne is fixed forever in the United States.—Metropolitan Magazine.

EARLY CARICATURES.

Quaint Art and Humor of the Ancient Egyptians.

The fables of Aesop prove that the ancients were not without a liking for fun, and the remains of ancient art tell the same story. Examples of artistic humor are more common than is generally supposed.

A drawing on a tile in the New York museum represents a rat dressed as an Egyptian woman of fashion. She is seated languidly on a chair, sipping wine out of a small bowl and being fanned and offered dainties by an abject looking tomcat with his tail between his legs.

The cat figures largely in the ancient comic groups of animal life. In a papyrus in the British museum a flock of geese are being driven by a cat and a herd of goats by two wolves with crooks and wallets. One of the wolves is playing a double pipe.

There is in Turin a papyrus roll that displays a whole series of such comical scenes. In the first place, a lion, a crocodile and an ape are giving a vocal and instrumental concert. Next comes an ass dressed, armed and sceptered like a pharaoh. With majestic swagger he receives the gifts presented to him by a cat of high degree, to which a bull acts as proud conductor. A lion and a gazelle are playing at draughts, a hippopotamus is perched in a tree, and a hawk has climbed into the tree and is trying to dislodge him.

Another picture shows a pharaoh in the shape of a rat drawn in a carriage by prancing greyhounds. He is proceeding to storm a fort garrisoned by cats having no arms, but teeth and claws, whereas the rats have battle-axes, shields and bows and arrows.—St. Louis Republic.

An Elixir of Life.

"An annuity is the best elixir of life I know of," said the examining physician of an insurance company. "It sometimes seems as if annuitants never die. We have lots on our books who top eighty, ninety and even ninety-five years. I have passed many a sickly and decrepit old fellow as a good annuity risk—the sickller they are, you know, the better risk they make—and the next year he has turned up to collect his annuity rejuvenated, rosy, spry as a boy. The secret? The secret is that financial worry, fear of the poorhouse, ages and kills off more people than all the deadly diseases combined. Release an old man by means of an annuity from all this worry, and he throws off his years and walks erect and happy and fearlessly young."

Hatmaking in the East Indies.

The making of bamboo hats is one of the chief industries of the natives of the East Indies, and quite often the children are more expert than their mothers in weaving the strips together and forming the designs, their fingers being younger and more supple. In transporting the long stalks of bamboo to the factory the natives tie the ends of two stalks together, spread them apart a short distance forward of the center, tie a crosspiece between and carry them on their shoulders.—Popular Mechanics.

Soused.

Wife—My husband came home from the club last night with such a swelled head that I haven't been able to arouse him today. Neighbor—Why don't you try pouring a pitcher of water over his head? Wife—I did that very thing, but the only thing he did was to call out for an umbrella.—Fliegende Blatter.

Love Taps.

Mrs. Jawback—I suppose you consider your judgment far superior to mine, Mr. Jawback—No, my dear. We proved the contrary when we chose to marry each other.—Cleveland Leader.

She—Mother never leaves the house. She simply hates visiting.

He (with sudden decision)—Will you be mine, darling?—Boston Transcript.

There seems to be a strong sentiment in the community in favor of some place for rest and recreation to provide not only for farmers and their families when they come to town, but also for those who have been accustomed to spend a portion of their time in the saloons. The problem is not an easy one to solve in a way that shall be satisfactory to all concerned. There was a joint meeting on Tuesday evening of the executive committee of the Good Citizenship League and a special committee from the Ladies' Local Option club to consider the question, but no definite conclusions were reached.—East Jordan Herald.

The Otsego County Potato and Clover Grower's association will raise a sample acre of potatoes. It is desired to plow the ground very early, to plant pure seed, half an acre to an early and half an acre to a late variety; to fertilize with commercial fertilizer, and to spray half of each kind of potatoes for blight to compare with the unsprayed half. It is hoped to dig the tubers one day of the fair, and to auction off the product, limiting the amount any one person may purchase.

Some people talk as though farming don't pay up here in northern Michigan, but L. H. M. Comstock is of a different opinion. He has a farm of 225 acres in S. Forest that he has been conducting for ten years, which he values at $10,000, and in that time outside of all cedar and lumbering the farm has more than paid for itself. What Mr. Comstock has done, thousands of other men can do, and quite a number are doing it right here in Presque Isle and Cheboygan counties. It certainly pays to farm when a farmer farms his farm instead of the road between the farm and town.—Onaway Inter-Lake.

Louis Mosier, seventy-three years old, and for half a century a resident of Leelanau county, was drowned in Lake Leelanau, his body being found in seven feet of water by August Otto. His daughter, Mrs. Isabel Labonts, was drowned in Lake Leelanau when the steamer Leelanau blew up last summer.

Mr. Mosier was born in Canada and for seventeen years was a great lakes sailor. Moving to Provemont he engaged in the milling business finally going to Buffalo, remaining there some time, and forty-two years ago returning to Provemont. His wife died three years ago, but a large family of children are left.

When he returned to Provemont, Capt. Mosier engaged in lumbering, operating a mill in the village. He was working on his boom alone and when he failed to returned to dinner, anxiety was felt for him. An investigation disclosed the fact that the boom was open and the logs running out, while Mosier's boat was nearby. It was thought that he lost his life while endeavoring to close the boom, his body being found under the logs.

Frank Doelker, an electrician from Hastings, fell from a scaffold in the iron stock-house at the Autrim Iron company's plant at Mancelona, to the ground a distance of 18 feet last week and sustained a fractured skull. He was engaged in doing some wiring when he missed his looting and plunging headforemost downward striking upon his face and shoulder. The side of his face was reduced to almost a pulp and his skull was fractured. Dr. Willoughby was called in attendance and was obliged to remove a section of the skull bone. Doelker has been in an unconscious condition the most of the time since the accident and his condition is very serious, but the doctor says he will recover. He had been at work here only a little more than a week and is 21 years old and single. He has a brother at Ludington. His friends at Hastings were informed by telegram of the accident and the Foresters there immediately sent word to take the best of care of him at their expense.

The March report for the Michigan asylum for the insane, located at Kalamazoo, shows a total of 1,880 patients at the end of the month, of which 1,009 were males and 871 females. At the close of the previous month there were 1,906 males and 872 females. During the month 27 new patients were admitted. There were 18 deaths in this institution during March, 12 males and six females.

The Michigan school for the deaf, located at Flint shows an increase of three males and three females at the end of the month, as compared to the total at the close of February. At the end of March there were 177 males and 142 females, a total of 318 in the institution.

REAL HAND GRIP AGAIN.

Elbow Shake Superseded by More Friendly Token of Greeting.

"I am glad to notice that the absurd elbow shake, which for so long replaced the sensible, kindly hand grip, is passing out of fashion," says Lady Violet Greville in London Graphic. "Who invented it, why it was foisted upon us, none has ever seemed to know. It was ugly, artificial and devoid of all the charm and intimate meaning of the handshake. To give the hand gracefully used to be taught in the old days of deportment. The curve of the elbow was studied, and grace became a part of the lady and gentleman's equipment.

"I have seen it stated that the angular, jerky movement of the present handshake is due to the period of hustle in which we live, so that the graceful, rounded movements which accompany leisure and confidence have given place to distrust, to a sense of opposition and conflict, which expressed itself even in the form of our address. Fortunately the true handshake is an unmistakable indication of character—the flabby palm, the limp grasp, the hearty shake, the warm, honest, feeling grip of the hand differentiate people as much as they do their faces or their appearances. Some people inspire confidence at once as soon as your hand has lain in theirs; others convey an indefinable sense of fear or repulsion."

REJECT SUFFRAGETTES.

The Canny Scot of Thrums Will Not Stand For the Ballot.

The first suffragette has set foot in Thrums, the little village which has been made known to every fiction lover by James M. Barrie in his delightful Scotch stories. There are few persons in Thrums who have not furnished material to Barrie, and the reading world knows these highland folk as rigid conservatives and with little patience for women who interest themselves outside their homes. Miss Helen Fraser of London was selected for the Thrums invasion. She met all Thrums in the village hall, and, true to the tradition of the place, her first words for suffrage were interrupted by Biblical quotations. A score of texts were shouted from all parts of the hall, and every one was against the spirit of the movement for woman's rights. For half an hour Miss Fraser's patience was tried; then her good nature won her a quiet hearing, and she was permitted to continue without further interruption. It was said, however, the canny Scots left the meeting shaking their heads soberly and exchanging views anything but favorable to the cause of the vote for women. One white haired villager was heard to remark: "Gae me wife a vote? Nae, nae, laddie; I'd cut off me right arm first."

Mrs. Park Sails For Orient.

The National College Equal Suffrage league, of which Miss M. Carey Thomas of Bryn Mawr college is president, was organized at Buffalo last fall by the union of fifteen college equal suffrage leagues scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The founder of the league, Mrs. Maud Wood Park of Radcliffe, has sailed from San Francisco for the orient. She will spend two years in studying the position of women in foreign lands. She will visit China, Japan and other eastern countries before going to New Zealand, where the women, as in federated Australia, are fully enfranchised; thence to Europe, where she will spend some time on the continent, and then on to England. Mrs. Park hopes that when she reaches England, two years hence, the women of that country will have gained the parliamentary franchise for which they are now contending so fiercely.

Miss Fowler an Anti-suffragist.

Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler, novelist, has decided opinions in opposition to the suffrage campaign. "For my part," she says, "I would advise the woman of today to confine herself to the four spheres of usefulness which are open to her and which she is so well fitted to adorn—the spheres of domestic life, religious activity, social influence and, finally, intellectual culture. I firmly believe she should keep clear of the one sphere which is at present closed to her, that of public and political strife." As might be expected, Miss Fowler's words have not been received with any degree of enthusiasm by the women leading the fight for suffrage, and vigorous criticism is the rule. There are many women, however, who endorse Miss Fowler's views, but they are not organized like the suffragists.

"Can you tell me why it is," asked Mr. Henpeck in a lapse in the conversation of his spouse, "that when they speak of their native country it always is the fatherland, but when they speak of the language they invariably call it 'the mother tongue?"—

The Other Girl.

By R. A. BEALL.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

To all their friends there seemed to be something essentially incongruous in the idea of their marriage. Friends, of course, as is well known, have the right to decide those things.

Grace Ormiston was a New England girl of an old Boston family, who knew her Emerson by heart. It was even reported that she knew what Robert Browning meant when he wrote:

Setebos and Setebos and Setebos.

Jim Garrison had been born and reared on a big Kentucky plantation, and he had obtained his education in that school which not only believes but vows that a gentleman's education is complete when he has been taught "to ride, to shoot and to speak the truth."

Yet their marriage had turned out a happy one, for with all Jim's ignorance of books he was a gentleman, every inch of the stalwart length of him. He did feel a bit oppressed, though, at times when his clever and learned wife let him "slide out of the conversation," as he expressed it, and showed by her manner that she knew it was over his head and that she excused him in sympathetic kindness.

The truth was that Jim would have been quite a bit the better for it if he had possessed more of a share of that of which most men have too much—conceit.

Poor Jim didn't have a bit, and he used to rub his handsome head ruefully and with very genuine sorrow at the harassing thought that he was not good enough for his brilliant beauty of a wife and that she must feel some degree of shame for him when she was surrounded by the wise and learned people who called on them continually.

When they had been married a little more than a year a telegram came for Jim while he was absent in Kentucky looking over some of his land. Mrs. Garrison hesitated before she opened the yellow envelope, for she was not a woman who believed in letting her curiosity get the better of her, although she had her full share of that delightful instinct of her breeding.

However, she finally decided that she should open the telegram to see if it was important enough to forward to Jim. Surely every one will forgive that! Women ought to be curious. It's part of their charm. Think of what the world would be without woman's delicious curiosity!

The message was short. But few as the words were they were sufficient to cause something very much like her little world tumbling disastrously down around the pretty ears of Mrs. Garrison. The telegram was dated from a village on Long Island and said:

The Girl is dying. Come at once.

It was signed "Jack" Farrington. Grace recognized this name as that of one of her husband's friends of whom she had often heard him speak, but whom she had never met.

Grace was not a naturally jealous woman—that is, nothing more than to say that she was not any more jealous than is any good, true, warm souled woman. She tried to remain unsuspicious; but, try as she would, she could find but one interpretation for the message.

Her faith in Jim was too absolute to believe that "the girl" referred to could be her rival since their marriage. She never gave place in her mind for one moment to any idea that her Jim was capable of the shameful, disgusting treachery such a surmise would presuppose.

But she could not help but see that this girl had some old claim on Jim and the thought of such a claim on the man whom she loved so passionately was sufficient to drive her nearly frantic.

She perceived that the sender of the telegram had taken it for granted that Jim would not hesitate to "come at once." And then she recollected with a keen sense that gave her new pain now that Jim always had spoken shyly and hesitatingly about Farrington and had evaded all her attempts to induce him to invite this friend of his early days to their home.

Her feeling was one of total desolation. She moaned at the thought there could be anywhere in the world a woman with such a claim upon her Jim that he must go to her deathbed. Mrs. Garrison realized now and all at once how deeply and helplessly she loved her handsome husband and how empty all her world of knowledge and art would seem to her if that love were destroyed.

At last, however, she began to think of the unknown girl who lay dying. With a mighty effort she put aside her own grief and telegraphed to her husband:

Mr. Jim Garrison, Phenix Hotel, Lexington, Ky.:

Come home immediately. A matter of life and death. GRACE.

She could not bear to telegraph to him that "the girl" was dying. To refer to her in such a way was repugnant to every instinct, and she was in total ignorance of the girl's name.

Before noon she received the expected reply. It read:

Leave at noon. Arrive tomorrow noon.

Grace Garrison, having forced herself to sacrifice her own emotions and her own wounded love and banished pride, was not the woman to shrink from making the sacrifice complete and deep. Love [illegible] best might-blessed on the [illegible] way.

She telegraphed to Farrington that Jim would reach home at noon of the next day and would come down to Long Island immediately and meantime determined to expedite his trip in every manner. Whoever this woman was to Jim, Grace resolved that Jim must reach her bedside before death closed her eyes if she could make it possible.

The railroad time-tables showed her that connections could not be made until very late in the evening, and she decided that he must be hurried down in her automobile.

It was a swift machine that had been bought especially for her use by her mother. Jim had steadfastly refused to learn to drive it. But Grace decided that it would not do to have the chauffeur drive Jim on such an errand, for fear of gossip among the servants. She came to the brave decision that she would drive the machine herself.

It was a very worried and excited man who ran to her at the gate of the railroad station. "Tell me what it means, Grace!" cried he.

Grace Garrison had faced the sacrifice, but she was a woman. Her face grew stern and cold. She replied that a crowded station was hardly the place for such confidences and waited silently till he was in the automobile. Then, when they were whizzing on their way to Long Island, she looked fixedly at Jim and without a word handed to him the telegram from Farrington.

Jim read it silently. His face denoted some distress, but it denoted more bewilderment.

"I'm awfully sorry The Girl is dying," he said. "It sort of breaks me up. But if she had to die I wish that I had been left in peace till I had finished business in Kentucky. I was just closing a very profitable little transaction."

Grace looked at him in shocked amazement. Jim stared at her and opened his mouth to say something, but thought better of it. Grace turned her face away to hide her tears, which she could not repress, try as she would. She did not trust herself to speak except once or twice to ask the direction from Jim. The last time she fancied that she heard him chuckle, but dismissed the idea as a morbid fancy.

Farrington met them with a cordial handshake and a strange cheerfulness, which was explained when he said hurriedly to Jim that The Girl was much better. Then he asked coldly if they would not like to see her.

Jim replied in the affirmative without a moment's hesitation, but Grace held back. Then Jim chuckled. It was an unmistakable out and out chuckle.

Bewildered, wondering, Grace followed the two men as Farrington led the way to the stables.

A rather feeble looking mare whinnied when she saw Jim and made a weak effort to get upon her feet.

On the way back Jim said with a happy smile: "You'll have to read up on one subject, anyway, darling. Anybody who knows anything at all about racing knows The Girl. She's the winner of the Shenandoah sweepstakes, the Cumberland futurity and the Gold cup, and she belongs to the racing firm of yours truly, Garrison & Farrington. I'm glad she is better; but, sweetheart, even if she had died I would have considered her well paid for by the knowledge I've won through your misunderstanding about that telegram. Am I very stupid, darling, if I think that you love me, even though I don't know much of literature and art?"

And Grace Garrison gave him a reply that convinced him that he was not stupid.

Preparing Robin Beefsteak.

On a certain occasion I saw a sturdy specimen of the robin tribe on the lawn searching for provisions for his family of clamorous gormands. At length, by tugging and perseverance, he succeeded in extracting a lusty angleworm from the tough sward and was making the effort to fly to his nest with the prey. But Mr. Worm rebelled. More than that, he writhed and squirmed with the greatest energy, and the bird that had come to market so bravely was in danger of finding his provisions so unruly that he could not reach home with them. But he was not to be defeated so easily. Stepping to the board walk near by, he deliberately began to pound Mr. Worm down upon the hard surface with an emphasis that bade fair to finish all protests and writhing. And so it did. A dozen pecks, and not only was the little fellow's beefsteak ready for transportation, but it was ready pounded for the broiler—or in this case consumption without the aid of broiling.—Young People.

He Did It.

A teacher had just finished explaining the use of the ditto marks when she noticed one of her young searchers for knowledge searching for it in a story book. So she made him stay after school and told him to write the sentence "Always pay attention" 100 times.

In a very short time he gave a glad shout, "I've did it!"

"What kind of language is that?" she remarked severely. "And you surely haven't had time to do it."

"Well, I'm done it, then. Anyhow, here it is." He held up his paper. The sentence was written once at the top, and the remaining surface was covered with dots.

"But you haven't done it!" she exclaimed.

He gazed at her scornfully. "'Course I have. Them's ditto marks. Made 'em ninety-nine times. They're good things."

What else was there to do but to let him go at once? And she did.

Courtenay saw that the girl could do no good now in that chamber of death. The mere memory of it would be an abiding horror. He wanted Christobal himself to send her away, but the doctor had taken off his coat and bared his arms. His appearance was grimly businesslike.

"Will you tell her how much I am obliged to her for her kind thought? But, you see, it cannot be permitted. Please say that I hope to join her in the salon in a quarter of an hour. My work is nearly ended. I am sure you will make her understand that this is not a place for a woman."

Again he swept the row of silent bodies with a comprehensive hand. Yet the trivial thought intruded itself on the sailor that this elegant old Spaniard delegated the task of explanation to him solely because he did not wish to appear before Miss Maxwell in a somewhat dishevelled state. He dismissed the notion at once.

"How many?" he asked, glancing at the quiet forms which bore no bandages.

"Eleven now. By the way, just one word. What chance have we?" Christobal put the concluding sentence in French.

Courtenay answered in the same language: "A very poor one. But I shall come to the salon and warn you. That will be only fair, don't you think?"

"Most certainly. Well, I may as well finish here." And the doctor signed to his helpers to lift the next sufferer on to the table.

Courtenay returned to the stairway. At the top stood Elsie, looking eagerly for his reappearance. A sense of unutterable anguish shook him for a second as he saw the sweet face, instinct with life and beauty, gazing down at him. How monstrous it was to think of such a fair woman being tattered out of recognition against the rocks! He bit his lip savagely, and it is to be feared the words he swallowed were not those of supplication. But his eyes were calm and his voice well under control when he said:

"Dr. Christobal is captain below there, Miss Maxwell, and he absolutely vetoes your presence. He was exceedingly distressed at being compelled to send you such a message. However, he will soon explain matters to you in person, as he is coming aft almost at once."

Elsie was disappointed. She dreaded the return to the salon, with its queerly assorted company. When she quitted them they were in a state of indescribable distress. Gray and the Englishman were helping the chief steward to adjust life belts, but Isobel was in a frenzy of despair, her maid had fainted, De Polnedill and the Spaniards were muttering alternate appeals to the saints and oaths of utter abandonment, and Mrs. Somerville was almost unconscious, while her husband knelt by her side and wrung his hands in abject misery. Anything was better than to go back to that woeful assembly, yet she choked down a protest and said quietly:

"I am ready. I am afraid I have been a bother to you, Captain Courtenay."

"Say, rather, you have given me hope. I think heaven has work for you to do in the world. Let me go out first. Never mind Joey. He can struggle along behind. Steady now. Head down and lean well against the wind."

Elsie found, to her amazement, that there was less sense of danger in facing the wind than in being driven along before it. Moreover, she had greater confidence during this second transit over the exposed portion of the deck. She felt Courtenay dragging her on irresistibly until they gained the lee of the smoking room. He let her rest there beneath the ladder leading to the bridge. Then a strange revulsion of feeling came to him. He experienced an overwhelming desire not to be parted from her. He had a sickening fear that he might never see her again, so he shouted very close to her cheek:

"Would you like to sit in my cabin a little while if I bring Miss Barlug?"

She thought that would be splendid. Courtenay, if any one, would succeed in calming Isobel. In order to make herself heard she in turn had to put her lips quite near to Courtenay's face.

"Yes," she cried; "I shall be only too pleased. But be patient with her. She is very frightened."

There is no accounting for the workings of a man's mind. Courtenay, at no time a lady's man, most certainly had other matters to attend to just then. Yet here he was thinking only of a woman's comfort. His dismal forebodings were banished by a rush of absurd delight at the thought that he would have an opportunity of speaking to her occasionally. What a brave girl she was! What a wife for a sailor! In truth, these were mad notions that jostled in his brain when his life and hers were not worth an hour's purchase. He drew her to the foot of the ladder.

"Run ahead, Joey!" he cried. The dog, a weird little figure, leaping forward at a ridiculous angle against the tearing wind, obeyed instantly. "Now, you," he said to Elsie, "but wait until I pass you at the top."

Though her skirts were troublesome, she managed the ascent. Then she was taken off her feet again and hardly knew where she was until she found herself in the haven of Courtenay's cabin. Joey was glad to be there too. He shook himself noisily in his heavy coat.

"You won't mind if I fasten the door on you?" And the captain so far forgot his anxiety as to smile.

"No, indeed." And she smiled in response.

"Very well. I shall bring Miss Barlug in about five minutes. You won't stir till we come?"

"What place that gale without you?" She almost laughed at the idea. He bolted the door and ran into the chart house to tap the barometer. It moved appreciably. It was rising! Ah, if only the wind moderated he could save the Kansas yet! He glanced at the compass; still the same course—not a fraction of a point gained to the north. That was bad. The ship was already within the danger zone. Pray heaven for a falling wind or even a change to the southward! Still, it was in an altogether more cheerful mood that he regained the promenade deck and made his way toward the salon.

He was in the very act of entering the doorway when a shudder ran through the ship, and she tilted slightly. Clinging to a rail, he waited, right as a statue. A second time the great steel hull shook, but much more violently. Then the Kansas ran her nose into a shoal, swung round broadside to the sea, lifted again, struck heavily and listed to port.

Courtenay was on the starboard side. He heard a yell of dismay from the men attending to the boats. Screams came from the salon. The sea leaped triumphantly over the rails and nearly smothered him with its dense spray. So this was the end? It had come all too soon. And what a place for the ship to be cast away—twenty miles from the nearest land, in the midst of a sea where no boat could live! God help them all!

CHAPTER V.

COURTENAY waited for the rending of plates, the tearing asunder of stanch steel ribs and crossbeams, which should sound the knell of the ship's last moments. But the Kansas seemed to be in no hurry to fall in pieces. She strained and groaned and shook violently when a wave pounded her. Otherwise she lay there like a beaten thing, oddly resembling the living but almost unconscious men stretched on the mattresses in the forward saloon.

Courtenay did not experience the least fear of death. Emotion of any sort was already dead in him. He found himself wondering if an unexpectedly strong current setting to the southeast had not upset his reckoning. If there were any broken limbs among the occupants of the salon. If Elsie had been injured by being thrown down into his cabin. He looked at his watch. It was just 11. In four hours there would be dawn. Dawn! In as many minutes he might see the day that is everlasting. Ah, perhaps not even four minutes! The Kansas, with a shiver, lifted to the embrace of a heavy sea, lurched to port and settled herself more comfortably. The deck assumed an easier angle. Now it was possible to walk. There were no rocks here, at any rate. Courtenay at once jumped to the conclusion that the powerful current whose existence he suspected had cut out for itself a deep water channel toward the land and the ship had struck on the silt of its back wash. Anyhow, the Kansas was still living. The lights were all burning steadily. He could detect the rhythmic throb of the donkey engine. He felt it like the faint beat of a pulse. In her new position the ship presented less of a solid wall to the onslaught of the sea. The tumultuous waves began to race past without breaking so fiercely. Had she started her plates? Were the holds and engine room full of water? If so, Walker and his helpers were already drowning beneath his feet. And when next she moved the vessel might slip away into the depths!

A man rushed by, or tried to do so. Courtenay recognized him as a leading stoker who had temporary charge of the donkey boiler and seized him wrathfully, his eyes ablaze.

"Go back!" he roared.

"Senor! The ship is lost!"

"Go back and await my orders!"

He could have strangled the fugitive in his sudden rage. The fireman endeavored to gasp his readiness to obey. Courtenay relaxed his grip, and for a time at least one member of the crew stuck to his post, fearing the mad captain more than death.

A mob of stewards and kitchen hands came in a torrent up the saloon stairs. Courtenay met them, a terrifying figure, and thrust a revolver in their faces.

"Back," he shouted, "or some of you will die here!"

Even in their frenzy they believed him. The foremost slunk away and fought in a new terror with those who would urge them on. Gray, bleeding from a cut across the forehead, knocked down a man who brutally tore Isobel out of his path. Tollemache, a revolver in each hand, set his back against the corner of the salon at the foot of the stairs.

"I'm with you, captain!" he yelled.

Courtenay saw that he had conquered them for the instant. He raised his hand.

"Behave like men!" he cried. "You can do no good by crowding the deck. I am going to the bridge to see if it is possible to lower the boats. Each boat's crew will be mustered in turn, passengers and men alike. If you are cowards now you will throw away what chance there is of saving your lives."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

"What would our wives say if they knew where we are tonight?" remarked the captain of a vessel boating about in a thick fog.

"I wouldn't care what they said," replied the practiced mate, "if we only knew where we are ourselves."—Lou-

BEING WELL GROOMED.

Exactness of Detail the Secret of Success.

At a recent luncheon a member of the fair sex was discussed, and all conceded she was a "perfectly groomed woman."

"It isn't because of fine raiment," said one.

"Perhaps not," remarked another. "Why is it, then?" chimed in a third, and the fourth settled the debate: "It's because she pays such attention to detail."

If all women realized what this meant more would earn the distinction of being well groomed. The exactness of detail is a wonderful thing toward making a woman appear well groomed.

The careless woman is much in evidence, and frequently she is among the wealthy. Yet her sister not financially so well to do makes a better showing on a much less expenditure of money, and all because she looks carefully after the niceties of the toilet. There is a knack in getting things on well and keeping them so. The woman whose heel is run over cannot attract any more favorable attention than the one whose braid on the bottom of her gown is frayed.

It is the little things which make one noticeable. How often a well gowned woman will be seen whose richness of toilet attracts all eyes, yet the otherwise perfect picture is spoiled by straggling locks of hair falling in disorderly fashion over the back of her neck. A hairpin would have adjusted the trouble, but lack of exactness to detail spoiled the whole costume.

It is downright laziness with many women, this overlooking of the little things in life. They feel too much effort is called into play to stop and properly adjust at the time the small essentials that go to make a perfectly groomed woman. This failing will crop out in women who have everything to make themselves attractive, and plenty to detail will be found in many who have a difficult time in "making ends meet."

But it is just this quality which makes others class them among the "perfectly groomed;" also makes them more noticeable than the women of wealth. A small rip in a glove will spoil a rich costume, as will also a veil with a noticeable hole in it. Such a veil will even mar a beauty.

On rainy days the woman lacking this essential quality of detail is even more noticeable, for she dons a costume, usually any kind of a one, and saunters forth. She is less likely to be particular than on a bright day, and her indifference to minor detail makes her anything but an attractive object. She feels the rainy day is an excuse for her costume and instead of dispelling some of its gloom only adds to it by failing to make herself an attractive object rather than the reverse.

HOUSEHOLD HELPS.

A large pinch of salt put in the tank of a coal oil lamp will cause it to give a better light.

Try a little lemon and salt mixed the next time a price mark sticks to the bottom of china dishes or bric-a-brac.

Instead of adding bluing to water in which lace has been rinsed try making the final rinsing in milk. It gives a lovely creamy tone to the lace.

A little muriatic acid added to the rinsing water after a blue and white fiber rug is scrubbed with soap and water will help to restore the color.

The easiest way to clean a cereal cooker is to turn it upside down in a pan of boiling water and steam it until the sticky mass is soft and loosened from the sides of the pan.

If your lamp smokes or gives a poor light it may come from clogged pipes. Take the lamp apart, boil the burner in soda water and pour hot water through connecting rods and tubes.

Do not put a tomato aside to harden in a tin or iron baking pan. The acid in the jelly acts on the tin and makes the salad taste, while the black pan gives an unsightly black rim to the aside.

A sticky cake or bread pan should not be cleaned with a knife or anything which will scratch the surface and make sticking more probable thereafter. For this reason the crust of bread often advised as a cleaner is not desirable.

Almond Eyes Newest Whim.

One of the queerest fashions that have ever been known to society is revealed by the facial expressions of the "lazy rich." The eyes long have had much attention, and at times they were lowered, showing only a little glimpse of the pupils. At other times it was the custom to have them wide open, like those of a country girl. Now certain well known society women have decided that almond shaped eyes are the perfection of beauty, and for that reason many women have marked their orbs with black to give them the appearance of Japanese eyes. Perhaps they have not as decided an oval turn as those of the little brown women, but it is certain from what has been seen of several women recently there may be physicians who give almond shaped eyes to beauty seekers. Such optics are said by those who model the recent queer dresses of women to suit the svelte form much better than the honest, round, open eye. The Gibson eye was down so much that the full length of the long eyelashes was seen to advantage. It is said Philip Bolleau is partly responsible for the almond shaped eye that has taken women by storm.

For Breaking Nails.

The constant use of hard water is fatal on the good appearance of the finger nails. This is one of the drawbacks to a filter plant. The alum used is hard on the skin and makes nails brittle. As, however, pure water is the first step toward beauty, women must use means of overcoming minor ills.

Nails that break easily must be given a course of olive oil. It should be rubbed into the finger tips each night. Massage well and occasionally give the fingers a bath in hot olive oil.

If it is not convenient to use the oil, vaseline is a good substitute. Whenever doing rough work the fingers should be protected with gloves. If it is not comfortable to wear them over the whole hand, fingers can be cut from old gloves.

Radiator Brushes.

The housewife who has not a radiator brush is giving her maid unnecessary work. These little affairs do not cost much, and they are shaped so that they get into every crevice of the radiator and take out the dust that clogs and is unsightly.

Ugly Hands In Evidence.

To keep the hands smooth and white soak them in sweet almond oil every night. Pour the oil in a bowl and immerse the hands for several minutes. Wipe gently with a soft towel and draw on loose white gloves for sleeping.

Incandescent Lamps.

Incandescent lamps can be colored by dipping them in a solution of white shellac in denatured alcohol to which has been added aniline dye of the desired hue.

Five Hundred Charlevoix County Patrons Will go to Traverse City in 1909

Ironton Grange No. 707.

Ironton Grange No. 707 met in regular session, May 11, with twenty-two members and one visitor from Marion Center grange. Five candidates were found waiting and initiated in the first and second degrees.

Lecturer's hour was taken up with instrumental music, songs, and a recitation.

For the good of the order the motion was made and supported that there be a dance one week from this coming Friday night, which will bring it May 21. A committee was then appointed to look after the dance.

Meeting then closed in regular form to meet again in two weeks. Grange refreshments were served, after which the members enjoyed themselves very much.

Barnard Grange No. 689.

Barnard Grange No. 689 met in regular session at grange hall Wednesday evening, May 5, and was opened in form by Master Allan Bolhuis. All officers present except chaplain and gate keeper. Master filled vacancies by appointing Sister Beattie as chaplain and George Sands as gate keeper.

After the routine of business, master declared recess for fifteen minutes. Grange called to order and work given over to lecturer, who furnished the following program:

Reading, Sister Jennie Beattie.

Talk, "My Trip to Mexico," Brother Thomas Cummings.

Grange voted to meet every four weeks. Next meeting will be held June 2.

There will be a box social at the grange hall Wednesday evening, May 19. Receipts sixty cents.

Peninsula Grange No. 706.

Peninsula Grange No. 706 met in regular session at grange hall Saturday evening, May 9, and was opened in regular form by Worthy Master Fred Heller in the chair.

After business session the time was taken up with readings, songs, etc.

Song—By grange.
Reading—Winifred Cliff.

Reading—Mary Gunsolus.
Reading—Ola Heller.

Discussion—Are the schools of your locality turning out boys and girls satisfactorily for life on the farm. It was discussed by several of the members and the decision was that it was not turning out boys and girls satisfactorily for life on farm, but in time that it would have to be taught in schools.

No other business. Grange closed in form.

COUNTY NORMAL NOTES.

The class did well with the benefit supper last Friday evening. Nearly fifty-one dollars, counting donations, was taken in. The class appreciate the way in which the Charlevoix people so kindly responded to our efforts.

Clare Finucan took charge of the ninth grade botany Monday for Mr. Devoe, who was absent.

Edith Brodie and Mildred Drescher began observation work Monday in first grade reading.

Mildred Drescher returned to school Monday morning after a week's absence.

The training room children and the normal class are very much interested in a little rabbit which Mildred Drescher brought to school Monday noon.

We are planning to begin our garden this week.

DIED AT HER OLD HOME

Mrs. Hannah Totten Well Known Old Resident of Norwood

Mrs. Hannah Totten, wife of Whitfield Totten, of Norwood, died at the home of her brother, Will Bolton of Norwood, Friday May 7. Mrs. Totten had gone to the home of her brother to help take care of her sister, Miss Francis Bolton and was taken ill herself. Everything was done for her but in vain.

Mrs. Totten was a highly respected lady who will be sadly missed not only in her home but in the church.

Norwood extends its sympathy to Mr. Totten and the brother and sister. The funeral was held Monday. Burial at Brookside.

THEATRICAL

Vaudeville at the Bridge Theatre

Being well satisfied with the attendance at his last week's vaudeville entertainments at the Bridge Theatre, Mgr. F. L. Spencer will return Thursday night May 13 with an entirely new bill.

Featuring the program are "The Fairtorns" who played here at the Bridge Theatre last week Monday, and gave the utmost satisfaction to everyone. They will repeat on Thursday night the laughable sketch "A Bit of Irish Comedy," and on Friday will introduce an entirely new act entitled "Murphy from Cork."

Saturday night "Holding a Fort." Two reels of pictures and an illustrated song will be run in connection with their act. One film in particular is worthy of special notice. It is called "A Case of Spirit" and is a "hit" up in this "dry country." Admission as usual, adults 10c, children 5c.

FOR CONSTIPATION.

We are so positive Rexall Orderlies will promptly relieve constipation that we offer to furnish the medicine free of all cost if the user is not satisfactorily benefitted. Surely we could offer no better argument as to why you should try Rexall Orderlies. They are particularly pleasant, are eaten like candy, and may be taken at any time of day or night without inconvenience. Two sizes, 10c. and 25c.

Four Footed Wisdom.

By BELLE MANIATES.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

When they heard that Lieutenant Cavanaugh, —th United States cavalry, was coming home on a month's leave of absence a general alarm was sounded, and they met in secret session for conference and action.

They were all openly and avowedly suitors for the lily white hand of Helene Kemble, and now they formed an alliance for the purpose of keeping the trespasser from their territory.

It was conceded generally that the odds would be in favor of an army officer, and, though they gathered solace from the fact that he never brought a mount with him, they realized that obstacles must be placed in his path.

The first fruits of their common cause against the enemy were seen at Mrs. Dalrymple's lawn fete, which occurred on the night of Lieutenant Cavanaugh's return to his home city.

Helene was talking to a little knot of friends when she saw her hostess approaching with a tall, square shouldered, good looking man. She prepared complacently to meet the young officer whose merits so often had been rehearsed to her. Before they reached her, however, one of her admirers quickly came up to her and bore her away to the dancing pavilion.

"WHAT AUDACITY!" SHE THOUGHT, TURNING TO GIVE HIM A GLANCE.

After the waltz was ended she saw the lieutenant approaching again in company with his aunt, whom Helene knew slightly.

Another suitor interposed at once, hurrying her to a table with such haste as to bewilder her. This program was followed the rest of the evening. Whenever Cavanaugh was seen in her vicinity some one was sure to intervene and whisk her away. She knew chance was not entirely to blame, and at last she divined and enjoyed the situation. She wondered if Cavanaugh was equally wise.

"If he has the diplomacy one in the service of Uncle Sam should have," she thought, "he will find a way or make one."

Once during a dance the young officer collided with her partner, and she felt confident that the action was intentional. As he begged her pardon his partner started to give the desired introduction. Instantly the man with Helene danced her away in double quick time. After this dance Cavanaugh took his departure.

"He hasn't what George designates as staying powers," she concluded.

Two days passed without any apparent effort on Cavanaugh's part to effect a meeting.

"He is either stupid or indifferent," she concluded, slightly piqued.

She changed her mind when she received from his aunt an invitation to a small dinner to be given for the young lieutenant.

"That was a shrewd move," she mused. "I wonder what he would do if I should not accept the invitation?"

A spirit of contrariness seized her. She determined to prolong the situation. She sent her regrets as to the dinner, pleading ill disposition. The ill forced her to remain indoors throughout twenty-four beautiful hours. It made her illogically indignant against the man, of course.

On the following day she took her first riding lesson, accompanied by a riding master and her younger brother, George. As they rode three abreast Lieutenant Cavanaugh, mounted on a shining chestnut, approached. To Helene's utter surprise he wheeled about and rode at her side.

"What audacity!" she thought, turning to give him a glance meant to be annihilating. Her frigidity was wasted. The young lieutenant was not even looking at her. With flushed face and set features he was concentrating his whole attention on his horse. After a sharp trot they came to a corner, and with a sharp cut of his whip the lieutenant turned and vanished down a side street.

"How dared he!" she vapulored. "If I hadn't shown by my manner what I thought of him I actually believe he would have spoken to me."

They turned at the next corner. To her dismay she saw him in the distance ahead of them. Angry as she was at his behavior, she could not help noticing that he was riding superbly.

"Let us ride faster!" she suggested.

They passed Cavanaugh at a gallop.

Instantly he rode with them again, but this time alongside of George. Cavanaugh said something to the boy and, again putting the whip to his horse, rode on. The lad reined up and gave vent to wholesome and hilarious mirth.

"What did he say to you?" demanded Helene indignantly.

"Oh, say, Helene, this is rich! He borrowed that horse of Jim Hunt, and you know Jim is a member of our troop of state cavalry."

"Well, what of that?" she asked unenlightened.

"Why, that horse is used to drilling fours, and Cavanaugh had hard work to convince him he wasn't on duty."

"Really?" said Helene relenting.

"Let me show you," said the lad eagerly. "I am trumpeter for the troop, you know, and I brought my trumpet with me to practice in the woods. Let's overtake him, and I will show you."

They urged their horses forward. The boy rose in his saddle and sounded the recall. Cavanaugh's horse responded instantly and swiftly.

"Lieutenant Cavanaugh," said the boy naively as the chestnut swung into line, "let me introduce you to my sister, Miss Kemble."

The young lieutenant acknowledged the introduction gravely and then explained the ways of his horse.

"Don't you think, Lieutenant Cavanaugh," she said sweetly, "that it would be a pity to interfere with the military training of your horse? If your way lies on this road, why not continue in fours?"

"It would be a kindness alike to horse and rider," he replied.

"I had exhausted," he said presently when they were back in the city, "all my knowledge of maneuvers and tactics, and it remained for Hunt's mare to help me out. I don't think it was her training alone that prompted the movement. I really suspect that she had grasped the situation and wanted to help me out."

"Suppose," she proposed innocently, "that we ride past the club."

"The charge of the light brigade against the enemy," he laughed.

George was discreetly silent, and the "comtdne" never was able to fathom the secret of the encounter. But they all got over it in time to appear at the wedding next year.

The Elephant's Sense.

Why an elephant should be afraid of a mouse is a mystery.—Some have doubted the generosity of the elephant because of his aversion to small animals, but none can doubt his intelligence. Buffon, notwithstanding his idea of the mere mechanism of animals, spoke of the elephant as at the same time a "miracle of intelligence and a monster of matter." Ernest Menault happily referred to him as the animal that carried his nose in his hand; hence the marvelous intelligence of his trunk. The senses of touch and smell cooperate. The nerves which extend through his trunk are so numerous that they equal in number all those distributed over the rest of the body. The elephant can keep perfect time to music. He has the ear perfectly organized, and the hearing is extremely fine. The eye of the elephant is distinguished from that of other animals by the pathetic expression of sentiment. Take him all in all, naturalists agree that he is the most intelligent of animals. And why should he be afraid of a mouse?—Exchange.

TUNING A PIANO.

A Professional's Experience With Irritable Von Bulow.

"Piano tuners are for the most part graduated from piano factories," says one of them. "While the piano tuner is required to know every part in the makeup of a piano, he is not necessarily a piano repairer. Nor can the average piano tuner or repairer tune a piano. There are hundreds of expert makers and repairers of pianos who wouldn't be able to tell one tune from another.

"The piano tuner is born, not made. His acute sense of the vibrations of sound is given to him at his birth, and the man who hasn't got this sense can't become a piano tuner.

"Quite a number of years ago, when Hans von Bulow was in America, I tuned the piano upon which he played. He wouldn't allow the instrument to be tuned in the wareroom, one of his whims being that even a short removal of a piano knocks it all out of tune—something in that theory at that. So I tuned it upon the platform upon which he was to perform. He stood over me all the time, letting out agonized whoops and German cuss words until I couldn't help but laugh in his face.

"Finally, when I had the piano almost tuned, he gave a few more shrieks and, grabbing the wrench, began doing the job all over again. I let him go ahead, and inside of three minutes he had the piano so hopelessly out of tune that it took me three hours to get it into shape again. Herr von Bulow had to pay double for this little exhibition of temper."—Spokane Sportsman Review.

How Dickens Learned to Write.

When asked by one of those wiseacres who are convinced that in order to write good English a man must be taught to write bad Latin where his son was educated, Mr. John Dickens replied with considerable aplomb that his son—er—well, his son—er—might be almost said, in a sense, to have educated himself. The street, the warehouse, Mr. Creakle, an attorney's office, the reporters' gallery and postchaise—such was the education that equipped a young man of twenty-four to preside at the banquet of literature at an unprecedented age, to make the best speeches in London, to go into the best society, to set the table in a roar, to lead every company in which he mixed, to travel, acquire French and Italian with ease and write the most animated letters known to the modern world.—London Times.

Crusty Old Gentleman.

"Some people are so queer," said the young mother, with a pout. "Now, I think there is nothing that should be more appreciated than a generous child."

"What are you referring to, my dear?" asked her neighbor.

"Why, the baby. I had him in the car yesterday, and right in front sat a crusty old gentleman with side whiskers. Four times the baby offered him a stick of candy, and each time he only frowned. When the soft candy got stuck in his side whiskers he became very fiery and told the conductor, 'Wasn't he rude?'"—New York Times.

Why He Was Popular.

"How do you know your husband is not a good poker player?"

"Because," answered young Mrs. Torkins, "no good poker player could be so popular as he is with other poker players."—Washington Star.

"You don't make very good music with that instrument," said the lunecent bystander to the man behind the bass drum as the band ceased to play.

"No," admitted the drum pounder, "but then, you see, I drown a heap of bad."—Chicago News.

CHARLEVOIX COURIER

The Leading Newspaper in the Best Little City Anywhere

VOL. 26. NUMBER 20 | CHARLEVOIX, MICHIGAN, WEDNESDAY, MAY 19, 1909 | PRICE $1.50 PER YEAR

LETTER FROM CALIFORNIA

Our Correspondent Writes of the City of Tulare

CENTER OF AGRICULTURAL COMMUNITY

Real Estate Dealers—Description of Country

Which Our Correspondent Answers in Poetical Form—A Land that the Devil Finds Delight in as His Own.

Tulare, Cal., May 9, 1909

To My Old Friends, the COURIER and Its Readers:

Months ago I promised to write of "Tulare the growing city."

"Tulare" is a Spanish word meaning "water-flag." Years ago the part of San Joaquin Valley comprising Tulare county, was covered by a huge lake, fed by the waters of the mountains. On its shores grew the flags, in Spanish "tribes." From this the name "Tulare" was evolved.

When the country became developed, the settlers installed a system of irrigation ditches, which used the waters which fed the lake. The lake receded, leaving much of the richest soil in the world (what isn't alkali) reclaimed as farms.

Add a magnificent climate, (when the thermometer runs up to a 130.) And the natural sequence was crops, which astonished everyone by their prolificness.

Tulare is now a city of 3500 population, with no saloons, (not long since there were fourteen here.) It is on the Southern Pacific R. R. midway between San Francisco and Los Angeles. It is the center of an agricultural community, which is making fortunes for the fortunate people who live within its borders. As I have said before, if they have the misfortune to buy alkali land, why then, oh my! they have lost a fortune instead of gaining one.

They talk of the riches of the people. You will find it was eastern capital that first started the golden nest egg in California. Alfalfa crops make dairying a profitable adjunct to fruit growing and ranching in general. Bee keeping is also an occupation which many men and women follow profitably.

A brand new industry and one which is stimulating the whole community and whose beneficial effects will be felt for years to come, is the planting and growing of eucalyptus trees. The virtues of these trees are so manifold as to stagger the belief of one unacquainted with their possibilities.

There are many societies and lodges all thriving and with large memberships.

There is a new $40,000 high school building.

A Carnegie public library carrying more than 6000 volumes.

The streets are wide and well shaded, with two pleasant little parks, well populated with Japs, Turks, Chinamen and the other half of the Orient, I didn't make mention of.

An ordinary flouring mill and ditto with the planing mill, a raisin packing plant and three creameries which are the most paying concerns in town.

The following is what one of the real estate men says in his posters:

Here nature's lavish productiveness is transformed into dollars by the industry and ingenuity of man

Here there are no bitter winters, no depressing and ifeath dealing summers and the efforts in the cold and sterile east, which sufifices only for a bare livelihood. ffere brings comfort, prosperity and finally opulence for men and women and their children. So much for the real estate man. He fails to add that those easterners must not fail to bring along their cash in order to become opulent. The few following lines expresses my sentiments of some parts of this portion of the U. S. A. and if the readers of this good old paper should ever chance to take a stroll this way, perhaps they will see things as I did in some parts of the "golden west," assuring the readers of this paper that they will think my sentiments written in rather odious language, but facts always suited me better than fiction so I give you plain facts with no trimmings as follows:

The devil was given permission one day,
To select a land for his own special sway;
So he hunted around for a month or more,
And fussed and fumed and terribly swore,
But at last was delighted a country to view,
Where the prickley pear and cat-claw grew
With a brief survey and without further excuse,
He stood on the banks of the Santa Cruz.

He saw there were still improvements to make,
For he felt his own reputation at stake,
An idea struck him; he swore by his horns,
To make a complete vegetation of thorns,
He studded the land with the prickley-pear,
And scattered the cacti everywhere;
The Spanish dagger, pointed and tall,
And last the cholla, to cut stick them all.

He imported the Apache direct from hell,
The size of his sweet scented ranks to swell,
And a legion of skunks, whose loud, loud smell,
Was to perfume the country he loved so well;
And then for his life he could not see why
The rivers should any more water supply,
And he swore if they furnished another drop,
You might take his head and horns for a mop.

He sanded the rivers 'till almost dry,
And poisoned them all with alkali,
And promised himself on their slimy brink,
The control of all who from them should drink,
He saw there was one more improvement to make,
So imported the scorpion and rattlesnake.
That all who come to this country to dwell,
Would be sure to think it almost hell.

He fixed the heat at one hundred and eleven
And banished forever the moisture of heaven,
And remarked as he heard his furnaces roar,
The heat might reach five hundred or more.
After having these things so thorny and well,
He said, "I'll be d——t if this don't beat h——l."
Then he flopped his wings and away he flew
And vanished forever in a blaze of blue.

Now this state of things was supposed to have taken place 4000 B. C. I can tell you there has been but little improvements in some places since then, especially in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Colorado.

Hoping you now have as dry a town as the best of them, I extend my congratulations to those who have fought the good fight and won the victory. I am as ever an ardent render of the COURIER and am still sounding the praises of "Charlevoix the Beautiful."

Yours as before,
ANNA HOWE

CHARLEVOIX WINS AGAIN

Defeats Harbor Springs Saturday in Eleven Inning Game

By a Score of Four to Five—Two Games Next Saturday.

The undefeated Charlevoix high school base ball team won another victory Saturday, defeating Harbor Springs in a hot contest by a score of four to three, in an eleven inning game, Charlevoix playing an errorless game and Harbor Springs making only two.

On account of the wet weather the game was played on the golf grounds and well repaid all who witnessed it, as it was a warm game from start to finish.

Next Saturday two games are booked, one in the forenoon with Petoskey, at Petoskey, and in the afternoon at Harbor Springs, with Harbor Springs.

The next game, on the home grounds, will be played with Boyne City, May 29, and, as both teams are evenly matched, a good fast game can be looked for.

MASS MEETING HELD

Committee Appointed to Secure Rest and Recreation Rooms

The mass meeting called for last Friday met in the Congregational church according to previous announcement. The object of the meeting was to consider the desirability of securing rest and recreation rooms in our city. It was voted that it was the sense of the meeting that an effort should be made to this end, and a committee was appointed to organize and incorporate a company that should have control of the movement: Dr. A. M. Wilkinson, Mr. Kane, Mr. Stacks, Mrs. S. J. Allcox, Mrs. H. C. Cooper, Mrs. P. D. Campbell and Mrs. H. A. Putnam were selected as that committee with the power to appoint their own chairman and sub-committees.

Mrs. W. E. Campbell will do dressmaking at her home on Antrim street. 18-t-f

MEGUZEE ASSOCIATION

Hold Very Successful Meeting at Central Lake

Next Year's Meeting at Petoskey—Seventy-one Delegates Present

Thursday morning closed the labors of the Meguzee association after a most pleasant and profitable meeting at Central Lake.

There were 71 voting delegates present, representing 12 chapters, located at Harbor Springs, Petoskey, Charlevoix, Boyne City, East Jordan, Bellaire, Kalkaska, Elk Rapids, Mancelona, Acme, Traverse City and Central Lake, and 26 out of town visitors.

There was no session of the association Wednesday morning, the time being devoted to receiving and placing the delegates. At noon the Congregational Ladies Aid society served dinner in the church parlors at the instance of the local stars. Supper was also served at 6 o'clock in the same place.

The first session, Wednesday noon, was a business meeting, Wednesday evening was the big session. Degree work of the order was exemplified by a picked team, "All Stars," of course. A school of instruction was held under the instruction of Mrs. Hattie C. Derthrick of Ann Arbor, Past Grand Matron of the order. This session was closed with a banquet, which fully occupied the attention of both guests and entertainers until the small hours of the morning.

The last session was held Thursday morning, at which time the business of the association was completed, including the selection of some of the officers, announcement of committees, as follows:

President—Nellie Harris, Boyne City.

First Vice President—Ella Wallbrecht, Central Lake.

Second Vice President—Inah Reed, Petoskey,

Secretary—Delora Hanel, Elk Rapids.

Treasurer—Susie Cramer, Harbor Springs.

Chaplain—Zinett Wisler, Mancelona.

Marshall—Stella Fisk, Central Lake.

Committee on Finance—Jennie Bacon, Kalkaska; Hattie Cooper, Charlevoix; Lon Hinman, Bellaire.

Committee on Jurisprudence—Annie Soule, Traverse City; Inah Reed, Petoskey; Otto Powers, Elk Rapids.

Committee on Credentials—Hattie Stevens, Central Lake; Zinett Wisler, Mancelona; Rosalie McGough, Traverse City.

Committee on Program—Susie Cramer, Harbor Springs; Mrs. Miller, East Jordan; Mrs. Boice, Boyne City.

Miscellaneous Committee—Margaret Potter, Bellaire; Irene B. Getty, Kalkaska; Marian Corbett, Traverse City.

The next meeting of the association will occur on the second Wednesday of May, 1910, at Petoskey.

Central Lake did herself proud in the way of entertainment. In addition to the business of the meeting, the visitors, many of them met long time friends here and enjoyed social visits in the homes of the people. Many of the ladies took launch rides in the numerous motor boats placed at their service by the owners. In the stores, nearly every window displayed some symbol of the order and gave indications of welcome to the visitors.

Districts to Pay Tuition.

A recent law passed by the legislature provides that rural pupils who have passed the state eighth grade examination can go to any one of three nearly convenient high schools and have their tuition paid up to $30 per year by the district.

The law provides that parents of pupils desiring to send such boys and girls to high school must notify the home district school board of such intention on or before the fourth Monday of June.

NATIONAL BOY CITY BOOMING

Inquiries Coming to Manager Brown from all Sections

JULY WILL SEE CITY IN FULL SWING

All Departments Will be in Charge of Leaders

What the Expense Will be and What Boys Should Bring to the City—Splendid Outing at Little Expense

General Manager Brown, of Boy City, is pushing things getting the grounds in shape for the coming of the citizens of Boy City in July. Already inquiries are coming to him from all parts of the United States, and the last week of July will see the city of over two-thousand inhabitants in full swing with all that goes to make up the life of a busy city.

The different departments are all under charge of the best talent to be secured, the directors of the different departments being the following well known gentlemen. Chief Director, Judge Willis Brown, the originator of the plan of Boy City. Assistant Director, Charles B. Hahn, organizer and director of "Boyville" (a municipal system of boy's clubs) of Anderson Indiana. Athletic director, Dr. J. C Elsom, Professor of physical training, University of Wisconson, Educational director, Professor E. H. Reynolds, principal Boy City college St Louis Missouri, Entertainment director, Professor H. H. Fuller, superintendent Public Schools, East Jordan, Musical director, Professor L. P. Christensen, conductor Christensen's Orchestra Salt Lake City, Arts and Crafts director, William B Stout, "Jack Knife" of St Paul Dispatch.

Boys, when they come to camp are required to bring only a few things besides which they need at home in summer, they should have extra trousers, strong shirts, tennis shoes, stockings, underclothes, handkerchiefs, bathing suits, towels, pajamas, laundry bag, mirror, toilet articles, fishing tackle, knife, fork, spoon, tin cup plate, etc. Musical instruments, books, etc. should be brought if possible. It will also be necessary to make arrangements for tent, bedding, cots, cook, etc.

FOR OVER FORTY YEARS

Had Mrs. Emma McCabe Been a Resident of Charlevoix.

Mrs. Emma McCabe, widow of the late O. A. D. McCabe, who died about a year ago, died at her home in this city Sunday afternoon of pneumonia.

Mrs. McCabe was sixty-one years of age and had been a resident of this city for over forty years.

She was a sister of John O'Neill, of Phelps, and leaves one daughter, Mrs. Maggie Glasgow, of Detroit.

The funeral was held from the Catholic church Tuesday. Burial at Brookside.

Woman's Missionary Society.

The Woman's Missionary society of the Congregational church will meet with Mrs. Frank Harris next Friday afternoon, May 21, at 2:30. The following program will be rendered:

SHAKESPEARE STUDY CLUB

Present Scenes From Merchant of Venice at Last Meeting

The last gathering of the members of the Shakespeare Study Club was held at the home of Mrs. R. W. Paddock on the afternoon of May 18, on which occasion scenes from the Merchant of Venice were presented by Mrs. Woodley as Shylock, Mrs. Fitch as Portia, Mrs. Iddings as Nerissa, Mrs. Hampton as the Duke, Mrs. Crofter as Gratiano, Mrs. Crane as Bassanio, and Mrs. Bridge as Antonio. The characters were well chosen and the actors pleased all by their interpretation of their parts.

Mrs. Woodley who was a charter member and a most faithful one was presented with a set of solid silver spoons, this being her last meeting with the club.

Dainty refreshments were prepared and served by the retiring committee Mrs. Thielen, Mrs. Paddock and Mrs. Shanahan.

A pleasant feature of the meeting was the presence of a former member Mrs. Fred Hubbard of St. Louis.

OUR STATE INSTITUTIONS

Interesting Facts Gleaned From April Reports.

The April reports of the State Prison at Jackson shows but two more prisoners at the close of the month as compared to the March report. The total number of inmates at the end of the month was 712. Seven new prisoners were admitted, three were returned from parole, but to offset these, six were discharged and two are out on trial.

The April report of the Michigan Reformatory at Ionia shows a decrease of 17 persons, there being in the institution at the end of the month 450. However, 20 new prisoners were admitted during the month one former inmate readmitted and three probationers returned. To offset these, four were discharged during the month and 35 were let out on trial or probation. There was one death at the institution during April.

The Industrial School for Boys, located at Lansing during April admitted 20 new boys, dismissed on trial or probation 35, discharged 10 and there was one death at this institution. At the end of April there were 761 boys receiving care there as compared to 783 at the end of March.

The State Public School at Coldwater had 155 boys and 31 girls, a total of 186, at the end of April, as compared to a total of 187 for the end of March. There were 20 new boys and girls admitted to this school during the month and six probationers returned.

The summer weather is taking quite a few inmates from the Michigan Soldiers' Home at Grand Rapids, according to the April report. At the end of the month there were 1,041 inmates, as compared to 1,084 at the end of March. However the grim reaper is fast taking away the boys of '61, there being 20 males and five females who died during the month at the home.

DROWNED IN LAKE MICHIGAN

Matthew Trowso, Fireman of Fishing Tug Green, Friday Morning

Matthew Trowso, age thirty-five, fireman of the fishing tug Green, was drowned in Lake Michigan while about two and one-half hours out of Charlevoix Friday morning.

He was walking from the pilot house to the fire room when his foot slipped on a lump of coal and he fell overboard. His cries were heard by the other members of the crew who threw a line but he was unable to grasp it and sank out of sight.

He was an unmarried man who had been making his home at the Ferguson House. His home was in Wisconsin.

To Honor Bishop Gillespie.

At the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Western Michigan at Muskegon last week, a fund of $10,000 was raised as a memorial to the late Bishop Gillespie, of Grand Rapids. Of the fund $600 was set aside for missionary work among the silk mill workers at Belding, where the auxiliary is assisting many young women. An additional fund of $60 was subscribed to other missionary work. Kalamazoo was chosen for the 1910 convention.

CORRESPONDENCE

FROM CENTRAL LAKE.

Another spell of weather.

Robert Morrow is one of our busiest farmers these days.

Herbert Clow is home from the west with a brand new mustache.

Potatoes have dropped and Mr. Hastings had quit buying last week.

Archie Cameron, jr., traveling salesman, made the town last week Tuesday.

Mr. Ruggles has been contracting crops for E. B. Gill, who is doing a lot of such work near East Jordan.

Rev. Helwig, of Williamsburg, and lady friend attended the anti-saloon mass meeting here Sunday evening.

Rev. Scott, of Kalkaska, visited the town a short time this week and spoke at morning exercises at the high school.

Mrs. Wilcox's mother, who has been ill for some time, died last Sunday evening at the home of Mrs. Wilcox.

Central Lake should have been on its best behavior Sunday, as it was blest with seven ministers, four from out of town.

Many strangers are seen in town since Charlevoix county went dry. One team stood in front of a saloon for over half a day.

O. R. Morse, contractor for Leonard Seed Co., ran up from Grand Rapids for a few days. He returned to contract near Saginaw this week.

Miss Benzel, of Bellaire, supplies Miss McKillup's place in the sixth and seventh grades at the high school. A. G. Morse has been filling the vacancy.

Miss Ethel Howey has been in a very precarious condition with a nervous trouble for some time. Her mother is at Ann Arbor for medical aid.

Norman Arnold was in this vicinity Tuesday contracting beans for J. R. Rice Seed Co. He will assist in the building of the big warehouse for Rice at Buckley.

George Ames, who has been sick with pneumonia, died Saturday. Funeral services were held from the Congregational church Sunday. Mr. Ames was a potato buyer here. He also owned a small farm about a mile east of town.

Rev. C. N. Holsaple, of Grand Rapids, spoke to a large crowd at the opera house Sunday evening. He brought up argument after argument to prove that the saloon contained no good thing whatever. Its adherents in many cases put up their men and get them elected. The men that represent us in making our laws were given a poor recommend. He said a great deal better men have no chance to get into office. He is chuck full of facts and he with Rev. Bauer, of Traverse City, will be a great help toward bringing Antrim county into the dry column next spring. Antrim, it is said, is the only wet territory from the straits to the Gulf of Mexico.

FROM HAYES CENTER.

Born, to Mr. and Mrs. A. Winnick Monday morning, a son.

Born, to Mr. and Mrs. George Fay on Thursday, a daughter.

Brayton Whightman has the foundation for his new bank barn nearly completed.

Clyde Dennis closed a very successful term of school at Maple Grove last Thursday.

John Leist Sr. finished his cut of logs in Hayes last week and moved his mill to Horton Bay.

Mrs. Frank Kane was at Traverse City a few days last week visiting her daughters Mrs. D. L. Trafford and Miss Grace Kane.

COUNTY NORMAL NOTES.

Kathryn LaPeer has been absent on account of sickness.

The class received a letter from Susie Sheldon in which she said she was feeling much better.

Last week the class made maps of paper pulp and this week they are making colored crayon sketches of mountain scenes.

The training room children and normal class are very much interested in their garden. Some onions and wheat have been planted, the children doing the work,

Barguins at Martin's second-hand store Charlevoix.

Bellinger is making a special price on Elgin and Waltham watches. Both ladies and gentlemen 10 and 20 year cases for $10 and $12. Look them over.

GOOD ROADS IN SWEDEN.

Every Landowner Must Keep His Section of Highways Improved.

G. Zerghirst of Climax Springs, Mo., who is especially interested in the Kansas City Star's fight for good roads, says: "Perhaps it would be of interest to know how the roads in Sweden are maintained. There are three classes of roads there—highways, village roads and private roads. The highways run between county seats, and the grades are limited to 2½ per cent. The village roads cannot be in excess of a 4 per cent grade. The cost of building is divided among the land owners according to acreage, whether it is government land or is owned by private citizens, except where one owner has an extremely costly road to build along his land. In that case he gets due allowance in distance for the cost of construction. No village road can be opened until it is built to the proper grade.

"As to maintenance, every landowner must keep his section of the road properly improved. If he does not a government inspector orders the improvement at public expense, and if the landowner fails to pay the cost the government takes a sufficient amount of his personal property and sells it to satisfy the judgement.

"Every man must maintain his own roads in that country under government supervision. One provision of the government law in Sweden also is that the driver is not allowed to ride up the hills on a loaded wagon if it is necessary to use a whip on his horse."

Road Improvement In Cuba.

One of the beneficial results of the American occupation of Cuba has been the establishment of an adequate system of roads and the beginning of construction. These roads are built primarily for the marketing of crops, but they are used extensively by automobiles as well. They are made uniformly thirty-four feet wide, with sixteen feet of macadam in the center. The surface finishing is placed on a foundation of ten inches of broken rock, and they have no grades greater than 6 per cent. Bridges are of steel, culverts of concrete. Ditches are dug in the low places, and the roadway is generally elevated above the level of the contiguous land. The main road is complete from Havana to San Cristobal and from Pinar del Rio to Esperanza, besides numerous short branches.

Bills For Better Roads.

In the Iowa legislature two bills have been introduced in the interests of better roads. One provides for the doubling of the county road tax levy, for the development of the most important roads which radiate from the principal market town in each county. The other bill places a tax of $5 on all automobiles under thirty horsepower and $10 on thirty horsepower and over, the proceeds to go into the state good roads fund.

BREEDING MULES.

Types Produced by Sound Draft Mares Bring Fancy Prices.

Many of the mules found in the average farming community are undersized and inferior in quality. This is probably due to the fact that farmers often make a practice of raising mules from the most inferior mares upon the place. To produce the best type of mules a sound draft mare, weighing from 1,400 pounds upward, should be used. It should also be the aim of the owner to secure the services of the best jack to be found. From such a cross there will be produced a large, heavy boned mule that will make a first class work animal upon the farm; also one that is readily salable at any time after he has reached three years of age.

The average of mule prices is higher than for horses, and this is well illustrated by statistics. For instance, on Jan. 1, 1908, there were in the United States 19,992,000 horses, valued at $93.41 per head, and 3,869,000 mules, valued at 107.76 per head. In the past ten years there has been a steady increase in the number of mules raised, while the prices per head have rapidly increased from year to year.

The grade Percheron mare shown in the illustration is the kind of mare that produces the large, strong mules which sell for the good, long prices. Mule foals at weaning time sell for $50 to $60 and at two and a half to three years old sell for from $100 to $225, according to size and condition. This range in prices shows the importance of size in the dam and good feeding from weaning time until sold, though some farmers seem to think that a mule will thrive on whatever will keep a gont. Though not dainty feeders and quite hardy, mules will repay their owners for shelter and good feed provided for them to the same extent any other animal will.

Good draft horses sell for better prices than mules bring and cost very little more to produce, but there is a brisk demand for good mules at profitable prices, and there is no reason why the farmer possessing good, large mares should not produce some mules, if he wishes, at a good profit.

Don't fail to call on the second-hand store while in Charlevoix.

How American Jusisprudence Defines the Traffic.

In the George B. Aken case the supreme court of South Carolina said: "The licensed saloonkeeper does not sell liquor by reason of an inalienable right in citizenship, but because the government has delegated to him the exercise of such rights."

In Harrison vs. the people, 22 Ill., 150, the supreme court of Illinois said: "It must be conceded that the business of keeping a saloon or dram shop is one which no citizen has a natural or inherent right to pursue."

In the case of Jordan vs. city of Evansville 103 Ind., the Indiana supreme court says: "To sell intoxicating liquor at retail is not a natural right to pursue an ordinary calling."

In Mugler vs. Kansas, 123 United States, the supreme court says: "It is not necessary for the sake of justifying the state legislation state prohibition referred to—to array the appalling statistics of misery, pauperism and crime which have their origin in the use or abuse of ardent spirits. For we cannot shut out of view the facts, within the knowledge of all, that the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, may be endangered by the general use of intoxicating drinks, nor the fact established by statistics accessible to everyone, that the idleness, disorder, pauperism, and crime existing in the country are, in some degree at least, traceable to this evil."

Hear what the supreme court of Missouri says in the case of the state against Dixon: "The liquor traffic naturally breeds disorder and tends to pauperism and crime."

The Illinois supreme court, 48: "We presume no one would have the hardihood to contend that the retail sale of intoxicating drinks does not tend in a large degree to demoralize the community, to foster vice, produce crime, want and misery."

In the case of Schmidt against the city of Indianapolis, the supreme court says: "The liquor traffic is not a harmless and useless occupation, but an occupation that is hurtful, harmful and pernicious to society."

By the character of the business the judgement of great men, and the decisions of our highest courts, the liquor traffic ought to be prohibited. As an economic proposition, if the business never broke a woman's heart, if it never blighted a child's life, if it was never guilty of horror and harm, yet it stands as a robber among the industries of this country.

MAILED LETTERS.

Owned by the Sender Until Delivered to the Addressee.

Many persons are under the impression that a letter once mailed is no longer the property of the sender, but belongs to the person to whom it is addressed. This is an error. Under the postal regulations of the United States and the rulings of the highest courts in the land, a letter does not belong to the addressee until it is delivered to him.

The writer has a right to reclaim and regain possession of it provided he can prove to the satisfaction of the postmaster at the office from which it was sent that he was the writer of it.

Even after the letter has arrived at the office which is its destination and before it has been delivered to the addressee it may be recalled by the writer by telegraph through the mailing office.

The regulations of the postoffice department require, of course, that utmost care shall be taken by the postmaster at the office of mailing to ascertain that the person who desires to withdraw the letter is really the one who is entitled to do so, and the postmaster is responsible for his error if he delivers the letter to an impostor or to an unauthorized person.

The vital principle in our political system lies at the bottom of this matter. In this country the state is the servant or agent of the citizen, not his master. It remains merely his agent throughout the transmission of a letter. The state may prescribe regulations under which its servants may carry a message for the citizen, but it cannot shirk its responsibility to him. —Washington Star.

THE CAPTAIN OF the KANSAS

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY EDWARD J. CLODE

CHAPTER II—Continued.

A revolver barked twice somewhere on deck. A bullet smashed one of the windows of the music room and lodged in a panel behind Courtenay. They all heard the reports, but the captain promptly turned the incident to advantage.

"You see we mean to maintain order," he said. "Mr. Malcolm, take care that every one has a life belt."

A sort of cheer came from the men. Who could fail to believe in a leader so cool and resourceful? He peered into the darkness to discover the cause of the shooting. A number of sailors and firemen were striving to launch a boat. There was a struggle going on. He could not distinguish friend from foe in the melee, but he threw himself into it fearlessly.

"You fools!" he shouted. "You may die soon enough without killing each other. Make way there! Ah, would you?" He caught the gleam of an uplifted knife and struck savagely at the face of the man who would have used it. The butt of the revolver caught the sailor on the temple. He went down like a stone. Courtenay stumbled over another prostrate body. It was Mr. Boyle striving to rise. Their eyes met in the gloom. Courtenay stooped and swung the other clear of the fight, for the second and third officers were using their fists, and Walker even in the hurry of his ascent from the stokehold had not let go of a spanner. The yells and curses, the trampings of dim forms swaying in the fight, the roaring of the gale and the incessant crash of heavy spray made up a ghastly pandemonium. It was an orgy of terror, of wild abandon, of hopeless striving on the edge of the pit, a stupid madness at the best, as the ship's lifeboats on the port side were on the spar deck. In their panic the men were endeavoring to lower a dingey. Yet Courtenay saw that discipline was regaining its influence. He thought to inspire confidence and stop useless savagery by a sharp command.

"All hands follow me to starboard!"

The struggle ceased instantly. The captain's order seemed to imply some new scheme. Men who a moment ago would have killed any one who sought to restrain them from clearing the boat's falls now raced pellmell after their officers. No heed was paid to those who lay on the deck wounded or insensible. Herein alone did these Chilean sailors differ from wolves, and wolves have the excuse of fierce hunger when they devour their disabled fellows.

Still carrying Boyle, Courtenay led the confused horde through a gangway to the higher side of the deck.

"Swing those boats back to the spar deck!" he said. "Get falls and tackle ready to lift them to port. Don't lose your heads, men. You will all be clear of the ship in ten minutes if you do as you are told."

Two officers and a quartermaster sprang forward. In an incredibly short space of time the crew were working with redoubled frenzy, but under control and with a common object. For an instant Courtenay was free to attend to his chief officer. He bore him to the lighted saloon companion. Boyle was deathly pale under the tan of his skin. The captain saw that his own left hand where it clasped the other round the waist was covered with blood.

"Below there!" he cried. "Bring two men here, Mr. Malcolm."

When the chief steward came he gave directions that Mr. Boyle should be taken to the salon and Dr. Christobal summoned.

"Send some one you can trust to return," he continued. "Go then to the lee of the promenade deck. You will find others there."

He did not stop to ask himself if solicitude for the unfortunates wounded in the fight were of any avail. His mind was clear, the habit of command strong in him. Not until the sea claimed him would he cease to rule. The clank of pulleys, the cries of the sailors heaving at the ropes, told him that the crew were at work. At last he was free to go to the bridge.

He found the quartermaster in the chart house on his knees. When the ship struck, the officer of the watch had been thrown headlong to port. Recovering his feet before a tumbling sea could fling him overboard, he hauled himself out of danger just in time to take part in the fray on deck. He came back now, hurrying to join the captain, Courtenay, standing in the shelter of the chart house, was peering through the flying scud to leeward. The sea was darker there than it had been for hours. Around the ship the surface was milklike with foam, but beyond the area of the shoal there seemed to be a remote chance for a boat to live.

"We're on a sort of breakwater, sir," said the second officer.

"Seems like it. Is the ship hard and fast?"

"I am afraid so."

"I think the weather is moderating. Go and see how the barometer stands."

"Steady improvement, sir," came the report.

"Any water coming in?"

"Mr. Walker said he thought not."

"Perhaps it doesn't matter. Try to get the first lifeboat lowered. Let her carry as many extra hands as possible. We have just two boats. But do not send any women in her. If all is well, let them go in the next one. Take charge of her yourself."

"Would you mind tying this handkerchief tightly just here, sir?"

The second officer held out his left forearm.

"Were you hailed, too?" asked Courtenay.

"It is not much, but I am losing a good deal of blood."

"The brutes—the unreasonable brutes!" muttered the captain. As he knotted the linen into a rough tourniquet the other asked.

"Shall I report to you when the first boat gets away, sir?"

"No need. I shall see what happens. When she is clear I shall bring the ladies to you."

Pride of race helped these men to talk as collectedly as if the ship were laid alongside a Thames wharf. They knew not the instant the Kansas might lift again and turn turtle, yet they did not dream of deviating a hair's breadth from their duties. The second officer went aft to carry out the captain's instructions. Courtenay followed a little way, passing to leeward of the chart house until he reached his own quarters. There was no door on that side, but light streamed through a couple of large portholes across which the curtains had not been drawn. He looked in. Elsie was leaning against the table to balance herself on the sloping deck. She held Joey in her arms. She seemed to be talking to the dog, who answered in his own way by trying to lick her face. The glass was so blurred that Courtenay could not see that she was crying.

"Better wait," he muttered and turned his gaze seaward again. Yes, there could be no doubt that the almost unbroken swell within half a cable's length of the ship promised a possibility of escape. There was no telling what dangers lay beyond. To his reckoning, the nearest land was twenty miles distant, but the shoal water might extend all the way, and, with a falling wind, waves once disintegrated would not regain any considerable size. It was a throw of the dice for life, but it must be taken. He indulged in a momentary thought as to his own course. Would he leave the ship in the last boat? Yes, if every wounded man on board were taken off first, and how could he entertain even a shred of hope that his cowardly crew would preserve such discipline to the end as to permit of that being done?

The answer to his mute question came sooner than he expected. He had been standing there alone about five minutes, intently watching the set of the sea, so as to determine the best time for lowering a boat, when, amid the sustained shriek of the wind and the lashing of the spray, he heard sounds which told him that the forward port lifeboat was being swung outward on the davits. The hurricane deck was a mass of confused figures. The two boats to starboard, a lifeboat and the jolly boat, had been carried across the deck in readiness to take the places of the port lifeboats. A landsman might think that medley reigned supreme, but it was not so. Sailorlike work was proceeding with the utmost speed and system when an accident happened. For some reason never ascertained, though it was believed that the men in the leading boat were too anxious to clear the falls and failed to take the proper precautions, the heavy craft pitched sternforemost into the sea. She sank like a stone, and with her went a number of Chileans. Their despairing yells, coming up from the churning froth, seemed to be a signal for the demoniac passions latent in the crew to burst forth again, this time in a consuming blaze that would not be stayed. Each man fought blindly for himself, heedless now of all restrictions.

The knowledge of this latest disaster spread with amazing rapidity. Up from the salon came a rush of stewards and others. Overborne in the panic stricken flight, Gray, Tollemache, Christobal, the French count and the head steward, not knowing what new catastrophe threatened, brought Mr. Somerville and the almost inanimate women with them, leaving to their fate those who, like Boyle, were unable to move. Some of the mob rushed up the bridge companion; others made for the after ladders used only by sailors; others again swung themselves to the spar deck by the rails and awning standards. Even before Courtenay could reach the scene both the second and third officers were stabbed, this time mortally. He saw one of the infuriated mutineers heave the third officer's body overboard, a final quittance for some injury previously received.

He emptied his revolver into the tumbling mass of men, but he was swept aside by the fresh gang from the salon and perhaps owed his escape from instant death by falling on the slippery deck. He was up again shouting, entreating, striking right and left, but he felt bitterly that his efforts now were of no avail, and he bethought him that there was only one resource left. These frenzied wretches would destroy themselves and all others, so if he would save even a few of the lives intrusted to his care at least one of the boats must be protected. The struggle was fiercest for the possession of the two lifeboats. By a determined effort the jolly boat might be secured.

So he fell to—oddity—help from the few he could trust, from the tiny company of white men he had left in the saloon. He met them, a forlorn procession, coming up to the bridge. The all powerful instinct of self preservation, aided, no doubt, by the stinging, drenching showers of spray, had gone far toward reanimating Isobel and her maid, while Mrs. Somerville, a woman advanced in years, was able to walk, though benumbed with the sudden cold. Courtenay unlocked the door of his cabin. Elsie, her face pale and tear stained, but outwardly composed, was yet standing near the table, and the dog sprang from her arms the moment his master appeared.

Each man fought blindly for himself, heedless now of all restrictions.

"Thank God!" she said, all of a flutter now that the solitary waiting for a death which came not was ended. "I feared I should never see you again. Is the ship lost?"

The wild soughing of the wind rendered her words indistinct, and the captain had no time for explanations.

"In here!" he shouted to Gray, who had helped Isobel to enter the chart room, the first refuge available on this exposed deck.

"Sharp with it!" he thundered when Isobel was unwilling to face the storm again. The men took their cue from his imperative tone. Gray clasped Isobel in his arms and lifted her bodily through the doorway. The others followed his example. Soon the three women were with Elsie in the cabin. Isobel, by sheer reaction from her previous hysteria, was sullen now and heedless of all considerations save her own misery. When she set eyes on Elsie she snapped out:

"You here?"

"Yes. Captain Courtenay brought me to his cabin after our return from the fore saloon."

"Oh, did he? And he left me with those devils beneath!"

They both heard Courtenay's hurried order:

"Leave the ladies here until we can come for them. Follow me at once."

The door slammed behind the men. Elsie helped Mrs. Somerville to a chair. Then she turned to Isobel and said gently:

"It is a slight thing to discuss when any moment may be our last, but the captain placed me here while he went to bring you. He had gone only a few seconds when the ship struck."

The crest of a wave combed over the upper works and pounded the solid beams and planks of the cabin until they creaked. The ship lifted somewhat as the sea enveloped her.

"Oh, this is awful!" shrieked Isobel. "If I must die, let me die quickly! I shall go mad!"

"Calm yourself, dear. There must be an end of our sufferings soon. Perhaps we may escape even yet."

"Yes, I know. If any one is saved it will be you. You left me down there to take my chance among those fiends. You have been here hours with your precious captain, no doubt. Were he looking after his ship this might not have happened. Why did I ever come on this wretched vessel, and with you, who ran away from Ventana? I should have been warned by it. When he could work me no other evil he sent you. Oh, you have taken a fine vengeance, Pedro Ventana! May you be denied mercy as I am denied it now! Go away! If you touch me I shall strike you! I hate you! I tell you I am losing my senses!" Do you wish me to tear your face with my nails?"

Elsie, who would have soothed her distraught friend with a loving hand, drew back in real fear that she was confronted by a maniac. The utter outrageousness of this new infliction brought tears to her eyes. Yet she choked back her grief for the sake of the others.

Another heavy sea pitched on board. The Kansas trembled and listed suddenly. Isobel screamed shrilly and burst into a storm of dry eyed sobs. Her mood changed instantly into one of abject submission. She sprang toward Elsie with hands outstretched.

"Oh, save me, save me!" she wailed. "God knows, I am not fit to die!"

There are some noble natures which find strength in the need to comfort the weakness of others. Elsie drew the distracted girl close to her and placed an arm around her neck.

It was thus that Courtenay found them when he appeared at the door after a lapse of time which none of them could measure.

"Now, Miss Maxwell, you first," he said, with an air of authority which betokened some new move of utmost importance.

"First—for what?" she managed to ask.

"You are going off in a boat. It is your best chance. Please be quick."

"No, Miss Baring goes before me, then the others. I shall come last."

"Have it as you will. I addressed you because you were nearest the door. Come along, Miss Baring."

He waited for no further words. He grasped Isobel's arm and led her out into the darkness. It seemed to be a very long time before he returned.

"Now, Mrs. Somerville," he said, but that unhappy lady was so unnerved that he had to carry her.

"Can you manage to bring the maid?" he asked over his shoulder to Elsie. She stooped over the maid, but the girl wrestled and fought with her in frantic dread of the passage along the deck and of facing that howling sea in a small boat.

Elsie herself was almost worn out when Courtenay came back. He took in the situation at a glance. He picked up the shrieking maid in his strong arms.

"You won't mind waiting for me," he said to Elsie. "Don't attempt to come alone. You are too exhausted."

It was a fine thing to do, but she smiled at him to show that she could still repay his confidence.

"I shall wait," she said simply.

So she was left there all alone again without even the dog to bear her company.

CHAPTER VI.

THIS final waiting for the chance of succor seemed to be the hardest trial of all. The door had been hooked back to keep it wide open, so wind and sea invaded the trim privacy of the cabin. Spray leaped over the ship in such dense sheets that a considerable quantity of water quickly lodged on the port side, where Courtenay's bunk was fixed. There were no means of escape for it in that quarter, and the angle at which the Kansas lay would permit a depth of at least two feet to accumulate ere the water began to flow out through the door to the starboard.

At the great crises of existence the stream of thought is apt to form strange eddies. Courtenay when the ship struck—and it was possible that each second might register his last conscious impression—found himself coolly reviewing various explanations of the existence of an uncharted shoal in a locality situate many miles from the known danger zone. Elsie, strung half consciously to the highest tension by the affrighting probability of being set adrift in a small boat at the mercy of the sea, pouring without—a sea which combined the steel hull of the

THE Traverse City Record publishes the following editorial, which for good hard sense would be difficult to improve upon:

"The government is about to open up some more Shoshone Indian lands and the usual number will undoubtedly make applications and take part in the struggle for free land." However, coming right to the point, the land is not so "free" as it seems.

"In the first place, there is a matter of irrigation. Water cannot be supplied free nor can the preliminary work necessary to supply this water be done without cash, hence the homesteader will have to pay a mere matter of $46 an acre for this. This is payable in 10 annual installments without interest, but at the same time, makes the land cost that much more per acre. Then there is the cost of maintaining and operating the system which amounts to $1 an acre annually in addition. A little mental arithmetic will show what the total annual cost of a forty in that section will be, to say nothing of incidentals such as transportation, etc.

"We are not decrying the government projects but when there is so much good land in this state available for a few dollars an acre, it seems that anyone in Michigan who is contemplating taking up this western land is making a mistake. According to the statements issued by the government, the crops are very similar to those raised in this region and the yield is no greater. Another thing that should be borne in mind is the fact that no irrigation is necessary here and that when the land is taken and paid for, that is the end of it, there being no never ending water rental.

"Another thing to be considered is that we are adjacent to the greatest market in the country, Chicago, and that as yet undeveloped territory, which will be ours some day, the great Northwest.

"In looking about for funds for homesteading or even for investment, it is best not to overlook Michigan."

COMMON COUNCIL

May 18, 1909.

At a regular meeting of the common council for the City of Charlevoix held on the above date the following Alds. were present: Swinton, Paddock, Glassford, Rachow, Geiken and Webster, Mayor Wilbur presiding.

Minutes of last meeting read and approved.

CHEAP ROAD MATERIALS.

Sand-clay Combination Is a Good Substitute For Macadam.

In connection with the good roads movement in Kansas it is worth while calling attention once more to the stretches of sand-clay roads built out of Dodge City and Garden City last summer by the field force of the office of public roads of the department of agriculture in Washington.

In a macadam road the dust ground off the fine bits of rock with which the surface is made acts as a binder, forming a tight roof that sheds water if properly constructed. In the sand-clay roads the clay serves as the binder. The proportion of clay to be used depends on the quality of the sand.

The proper proportions of the mixture are determined by filling a glass with the sand and then filling it up with water. The water is poured off and measured. Since it just fills the space between the sand grains it represents about the amount of clay necessary to be mixed with this quantity of sand.

The sand-clay road when well constructed makes a fairly good highway even in the spring rains. But the government experts don't suggest it as a substitute for macadam except in territory where rock is so scarce as to make the cost of macadam roads prohibitive. In territory of this sort sand beds are often found in connection with clay, and the sand-clay combination is infinitely better than the ordinary or barnyard variety of dirt highways, into which the wagons sink to the hubs when the spring rains set in.

The department estimates that the sand-clay roads can be built at a cost of from $300 to $800 a mile, depending of course, on the distance of hauling. The expense of maintenance is not heavy. If the road becomes muddy more sand must be hauled on, and if it becomes sandy more clay must be used. The surface must be kept crowned with a drag.

Macadam roads cost about ten times as much for construction, but the department believes they are worth the extra expense whenever it is at all practicable to construct them.

It is understood in Washington that the roads built in western Kansas have proved serviceable and that extensions are to be constructed by the communities that have tried them.

New System of Highway Maintenance.

Patrick E. Leahy, commissioner of highways, borough of Queens, has organized a new system of inspection and repair of highways, says a Long Island City (N. Y.) dispatch. The borough has been divided into a number of districts as follows: Long Island City, 8; Newtown, 6; Flushing, 12; Jamaica, 12; Rockaway, 5. Each of these districts is to be in charge of an assistant foreman, who will be held strictly responsible for the condition of his district. The names of each assistant foreman and his men will be furnished to the property owners and residents of the district, and the latter will be encouraged to co-operate with the new commissioner. Reports will be received from the foremen every night as to the work that has been done during the day and the hours each man began work and when he stopped. The department has $850,000 to spend on maintenance of the 881 miles of highways, which have cost from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 and are in bad shape.

Liquid Asphalt Makes Good Road.

The road committee of the board of chosen freeholders of Mercer county, N. J., has inspected the Hopewell and Stoutsburg road, which was recently macadamized and treated with liquid asphalt. The road was found to be in good condition and at present can scarcely be distinguished from an asphalt pavement. The liquid asphalt was incorporated in the road during its construction, being sprayed upon the binder, and the finer stone, or top dressing, being rolled into the mixture afterward. The extra cost was 8 cents a square yard. The stretch of highway treated measures two miles.

A Difficult Feat.

At a New York hotel an out of town man had left his family, which had accompanied him to the city, in their rooms so long that they had become uneasy about him. At last he returned to the rooms, and to the anxious inquiry of his wife, "Where in the world have you been so long?" he responded calmly, "I've just been in the cuspidor, walking 'round and 'round."

SHOW LARGE INCREASE

Report of Savings Deposits in State Banks of Michigan

Michigan state banks are in fine condition so far as their funds and assets are concerned, according to the report of the state banking examiner issued. The report which is for the period ending April 28, states that the aggregate footings of state banks at that time amounted to $256,576,174.74, which marks the highest point in the footings of this class of banks.

Reference is also made to the panic of 1907, when the footings dropped from $251,218,712.77 on August 27 to $238,911,142.38 on February 14, 1908.

In the 11 months elapsing since the last date, the state banks have made the enormous gain in total footings of $17,664,230.36, of which increase $13,000,000 was in the savings deposits alone.

The last previous report to the banking department was made on February 5, 1909, and a comparison of the figures of that report with those of the last report shows an increase of $5,928,836.63 in loans, discounts, mortgages and securities and an increase in deposits of $1,570,813.21, of which over $1,000,000 is in savings deposits.

The department states that the legal reserve of state banks at the time of the last report was $46,751,192.38, constituting a reserve of 21.1 per cent of the total deposits, and the cash reserve amounted to 14,813,325.73, equaling a cash reserve of 6.8 per cent.

The state of Michigan does more to make things taste good than any similar governmental organization in the world. She is the greatest salt producing state in the greatest salt producing country of the world. This final eminence is an important industry was attained in 1908, and is now publicly recognized by the geological survey, in a new report. Heretofore Michigan has been slightly bettered by New York in the cash value of salt output, but in 1908 for the first time the Wolverine state exceeded New York in both quantity and quality of output. Michigan produced 10,191,270 barrels of salt last year, valued at $2,458,303. The total production of the country was 28,822,062 barrels valued $7,553,632.

In an opinion handed down last week the supreme court holds that in absence of anything in the record impugning the regularity of the proceedings of the board, or the accuracy of its canvass of the votes before it, that its determination must be considered final. The case is that of the Haehnie Brewing Co. of Jackson against the supervisors of that county. Incidentally, it destroys the last ray of hope the "wets" may have had to reclaim the county, until the next election at least.

Irregularities were charged in several of the townships in the county, but the irregularities were evidently of a technical nature, and in the opinion of the board did not materially affect the election results. The supreme court holds that its report, as made by the canvassing board, must be taken as final. In this respect the opinion is along the same line as decisions in other local option cases which have been up for attention within the past several months.

The costs of the case are assessed to the respondent.

We wonder how many of our boys realize that land is going fast—boys brought up to think that in America land can never be scarce, that when they have played out at everything else they can somewhere get a piece of land for nothing and the next be a prosperous farmer can with difficulty be made to see it. In 1865 there were but little over 81,000,000 acres under cultivation in the United States. To-day the cultivated acres number 236,000,000 and these acres are not only our best, but they are fast going up in value beyond the reach of men of small means. Keen scented corporations smelling the inevitable battle from afar are turning their attention to land, and greedily buying whole counties with no idea of ever letting an acre go, but the boy who thinks he is made for something higher looks calmly on thinking there will be plenty left for him should he ever have to stoop to it. The sons of half starved teachers, lawyers, traders and others, who are unsuccessful in their over crowded callings are turning to our cheaper lands, sure to find there what they nor their parents have known never before—truly independent homes.

The meeting of Michigan Music Teachers Association will be held at Kalamazoo June 29, 30 and July 1st.

The object of the association is to establish and maintain among professors and instructors of music a higher standard of proficiency, and at the annual meeting this year an endeavor will be made to cause to be introduced into the state legislature a bill making it imperative that every teacher acquire a license to teach and register with the county clerk at each county before being permitted to teach.

POT GROWN BULBS.

How They Can Be Cultivated Easily In Houses.

More women would grow flowers in the house if there was not an erroneous impression that it required too much skill and an abundance of time.

There are, perhaps, certain kinds of flowers, such as roses and carnations, which do not respond well to the effort of the amateur, but bulbs rarely fail. Their culture is simple to the extreme—a good potting soil containing plenty of sharp sand, a long period of seclusion in the dark to make root growth and gradual bringing to the light.

It is at this period that most women are at a loss as to the proper care of plants. They cannot fail if they remember these few pointers on pot grown bulbs:

The best temperature for root growth is 40 degrees, for leaves and stems 50 degrees and for the best bloom 60 degrees. The ordinary living room is too hot for successful bulb growing. The cooler the room the longer the flowers last and the larger they are.

Bringing the potted bulb directly from the dark into the hot living room is the cause of short stems and stunted foliage.

Do not have too strong a light when the bulbs are first brought in from the dark. A shelf away from the window where the temperature is about 50 degrees is best until the flower buds begin to show.

Bulbs should never be kept in a temperature of 70 degrees unless they are to be quickly forced.

It pays to buy a high grade of bulbs if you would not be disappointed in results.

If the soil in the yard is too heavy for potting it can be lightened by mixing sand with it. Never bring manure in contact with bulbs. It is fatal to them.

To tell whether a pot is filled with roots turn it upside down, tap the edge gently, and the ball of earth will come out in the hand.

How to Ventilate a Sickroom.

In ventilating a sick chamber it is often desirable and necessary to leave the window open to secure fresh air. The best way to do this is to tack a piece of muslin across the open window by means of thumb tacks. If the air is chilly this will keep the drafts off the patient and will keep out the dust and dirt which might otherwise be blown in. If the day is hot and sultry, and those days are the hardest and most trying on a sick person, an ideal way to ventilate, purify and cool the air is to open the window or windows and stretch a piece of muslin across the opening, then lower the shades to where the window is opened, and after this has been done thoroughly saturate the muslin with cold water. Then place a large basin or pail of cold water under or near the bed. If this is done it often will enable a restless patient to obtain some much needed sleep and rest. As soon as the muslin becomes dry wet it again.

How to Clean Satin Slippers.

If you wore satin slippers last winter and find upon taking them out this season that they are soiled, it is well to clean them at once. If the satin is but slightly soiled get some pieces of stale bread and rub the surface gently with it. This takes off all small discolorations. Kneaded rubber will do the same work, although some women do not like it because it crumbles off on the satin. If the slipper is still soiled looking after this treatment, rub the entire surface with the thread. Remember not to go against or across it. White flannel should be used—a clean piece—dipped in spirits of wine. If this rubbing is done gently and evenly over the surface, the effect is excellent.

How to Make Cabbage Salad.

For a cabbage salad make a dressing with a quarter of a cup of flour and two level tablespoonfuls of butter rubbed together and cooked with a cup of vinegar. Add a beaten egg, a pinch of salt and a scant teaspoonful of mixed mustard. Beat all the time it is cooking. Cool and add at the time of serving two tablespoonfuls of thick cream, beaten, a teaspoonful of sugar and a few dashes of pepper. Shred or chop some cabbage and pour the dressing over. Garnish with hard boiled eggs cut in quarters and then across once. Add also a few sprigs of parsley.

How to Make a Shoe Bag.

A handy shoe bag for traveling may be made from linen or any stout material. Make two oblong bags exactly alike. To make the bags cut the linen in four pieces eighteen inches long by seven wide. Place two together and bind firmly with braid. Turn over a hem at the top three inches deep and draw up with braid. One drawstring holds the bags together. The word "Shoes" may be embroidered on each bag in double outline stitch.

A shark's egg is one of the oddest looking things imaginable. It is unprovided with shell, but the contents are protected by a thick, leathery covering almost as elastic as india rubber. The average size is two inches by two and three-quarter inches, and the color is almost pure black.

Miss Tiverton's Tea Basket.

By ALICIA SPRAGUE.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

Miss Tiverton always poured tea at precisely 3 o'clock in the afternoon for a select circle of feminine friends.

They drank tea at that early hour so that those who were married might get home in time to prepare 6 o'clock dinners for their husbands and that those who were single might be safely housed before the early darkness of the winter evenings.

Miss Tiverton sometimes wished that they might stay later, for it was always a long, lonely stretch between their going and bedtime.

Sometimes Lavinia Greer stayed with her, and on those occasions Lavinia's brother Richard would call at 9. And those were the social cases in Miss Tiverton's desert of dreary evenings.

She always made more tea for Richard and brought out her little sponge cakes. Richard liked the little cakes, and he liked Miss Tiverton's dainty ways, her delicate pink and white prettiness and her pale rose colored house gowns.

Lavinia thought Miss Tiverton very foolish to wear muslin all winter. "Think of the washing!" she said as she and Richard walked home one evening. "And Letitia Tiverton is as poor as Job's turkey."

"She surrounds herself," said Richard unshrewdly, "with an atmosphere of beauty."

Lavinia sniffed. She hated to have her brother say nice things about Letitia Tiverton. Lavinia had kept her brother's house for many years, and it had always been her great duty to nip sentimental affairs in the bud.

Therefore it was many weeks after that ominous remark of Richard's before she again spent an evening with Letitia. She took her work over in the mornings or went to the little tea drinkings, but she did not allow her brother to darken the doors of the little gray cottage.

One day Richard spoke of it mildly. "We haven't been to Miss Tiverton's for a long time," he said; "not, I think, for four weeks tomorrow."

Lavinia gave him a sharp glance. "How did you happen to remember the date?" she asked acidly.

Richard looked at her quizzically over his glasses. "I noted the date in my diary," he said. "I always write down the events of the day, Lavinia." He did not tell her that he had added after the formal statement, "Brought Lavinia home from Miss T.'s," the further comment, "Miss T. looked like a rose in her pink gown."

A week later he urged Lavinia to call. "She will think something is the matter," he said.

Lavinia shrugged her shoulders. "I have been there in the daytime," she said. "I don't see what more she can expect."

Richard thought for a moment. "She has told us that her evenings are lonely," he reminded his sister.

"Humph!" said Lavinia. "I don't know that we are called on to put ourselves out to go there these freezing cold nights."

Richard returned to his book, but after a reasonably judicious interval he looked up to say, "I saw a very pretty tea basket in a shop this morning, Lavinia, padded inside to keep the tea warm"—

"Who wants a thing like that?" Lavinia questioned scornfully. "I always make coffee, Richard."

Richard said nothing more. He loved tea, but Lavinia preferred coffee, and there you were. Yet the next morning he sauntered to the flaming Japanese bazaar, where were displayed native wares to tempt the tourists who were making the old fashioned southern village a halfway stopping place on their way to the tropics.

The tea basket was a quaint affair of oriental weaving with a gay pink satin lining and a green and pink cord and tassel about the handle. The pink made Richard think of Miss Tiverton. With a defiant look he went in and bought the basket and ordered it sent to her.

His heart failed him, however, when the dark skinned salesman asked him for a card to put with the gift.

"Just send it without," he said hastily. Visions of Miss Lavinia's wrath should she know of his purchase came to him oppressively.

The mysterious basket was to little Letitia Tiverton a source of infinite delightful speculation. She displayed it to her afternoon circle, the rose colored lining, the pink cord and tassel, the fine basketry.

"And I can't imagine who sent me such a beautiful thing," she ended radiantly when all had seen it.

At the first glance Lavinia Greer's eyes had hardened. Of all those women she only suspected where that basket had come from. Richard had sent it. This looked seriously like the beginning of a romance that would be most inconvenient to Miss Lavinia.

On the way home she thought over a plan. It was simple. At dinner she told Richard, "Letitia Tiverton was too silly about a basket that some one sent to her."

Richard started, and his face flushed. He realized that Lavinia had put two and two together and had guessed that it was he who had sent the tea basket to Miss Tiverton.

"I wish you had seen her," Lavinia parsned. "I wish you had heard her giggle and gush that you sent it."

Richard turned questioning eyes upon her. "But she did not know that I had sent it," he said. "There was no card, Lavinia."

Lavinia went on hurriedly. "Well, then, she guessed, for she bragged of it, Richard. It is—it was disgusting." Miss Lavinia's face was a dull red. She did not like what she was doing now that she was doing it. But she was desperate.

"I can't imagine"—Richard's tone was decisive—"I can't imagine, Lavinia, a woman of Miss Tiverton's delicacy doing a thing like that."

Lavinia tossed her head. "You don't know much about women, Richard," she retorted.

Richard walked abroad that night consumed by angry doubts. Surely Lavinia would not lie. Surely Miss Tiverton would not brag. His gold headed cane tapped the pavement irresolutely. Then suddenly he strode down the street, irresolute no longer.

Miss Letitia, alone and a little wistful in her small gray cottage, heard the tap of the cane as she had heard it every night when Richard went forth for his evening walk.

Behind her curtains she had watched him regularly and had admired the straightness of him, the briskness of his walk, the brown waves of hair which in defiance of modern fashion he wore so long that it almost touched his coat collar.

It had never dawned on Miss Tiverton that such a great being as Lavinia's brother could look upon her and find her lovely. In her humility she had not dreamed that the basket was an offering from such a source.

She had thought the women of her circle might have dubbed together to bestow on her this gift of friendship, and her effusiveness at the afternoon gathering had been due to her gratitude.

The tap of the gold headed cane sounded right in front of her gate, stopped and began again on the stone walk that led to the front door.

Then the bell rang. Miss Tiverton answered it. Richard stepped over her threshold—for the first time without his sister Lavinia.

"I came," he said when he was seated, "to ask a question, a delicate question, Miss Tiverton. Who sent you your tea basket?"

Miss Letitia's clear eyes met his frankly. "Oh, did Lavinia tell you that one was sent me?" she asked. "It's such a beauty!" And she brought it to him, displaying the rose lining and the tassels.

Richard drew a long breath of relief. The doubts that Lavinia had planted fled. There was nothing of deceit in that childlike soul, in that flowerlike face.

"Miss Letitia," he said, with his hand on the basket, "haven't you guessed who sent it?"

Her puzzled glance met his. "No," she murmured.

"I—I sent it," he confessed, "because it reminded me of you—the rose color and the pink—like your pretty gown, your pretty self, a rose of a woman."

Miss Letitia stood half poised for flight. "Oh!" she said breathlessly, and her eyes were like stars. "Oh, Mr. Greer!"

Richard grew bolder. "I sent it because I love you, Letitia. There is no happiness that could exceed that of winning you for my wife."

It came upon little Letitia almost too suddenly. That vision of happiness, and she swayed toward him, looking just then more like a lily than a rose, and the tea basket dropped from her nerveless hand.

Richard caught it deftly as he drew her to him. "You will pour tea for me, won't you," he demanded, trying to bring the color back to her cheeks, "for the rest of my days, Letitia? Lavinia gives me coffee—but, then, oh, hang Lavinia! Will you marry me, sweetheart?"

And Miss Letitia after a startled "Oh, Richard!" hurled her face against his coat and said, "Yes."

Don't Be Cheap.

Do not hold yourself too cheap. If you do not think well of yourself others are not likely to think much of you. You are usually taken at your own value. By this is not meant a foolish self conceit, but a proper self respect.

Have a regard for the esteem of those whose opinion is worth having. No one can be admired by all. He who has no enemies may doubt whether he has real friends. Try to win the regard of the good and the wise. If the foolish take offense, pass it by.

Think too well of yourself to stoop to anything coarse, mean or untrue. However humble your station in life may be, you may think yourself worthy only of that which is good and true. To be genuine puts you on a high level. Whatever your purse, you may be rich in character. Think yourself worthy of the best to which you can attain. Aim for the highest you see, and should you fail to reach it you will still be higher than if your aim had been low.—Milwaukee Journal.

Unfeeling.

A soft air shook the honeysuckle vine, and puffs of delicate perfume floated gently to where cradle Rhinkinsop sat spooning with his girl. Not a leaf stirred. Only the stars and moon above and the green earth below. All around was the atmosphere of love.

His tone was reverend and hushed. It was as if this slim and beautiful maiden were in his eyes a goddess.

"Darling," he exclaimed, pausing in his ecstatic osculations, "each time I kiss you it makes a better man of me!"

They fell to again.

A voice from above broke harshly on the night:

"What are you by now, then, saint or archangel?"

A burst of ribald laughter, the rattle of a closing window and then once more the holy calm of undisturbed night.—London Scraps.

Caught Them All Around.

A Moslem ruler spoke to his people one Friday from the pulpit in the market place.

"People, what shall I preach to you about today?" "We do not know," they replied. "Well, if you don't know I shall not tell you." And down he came from the pulpit. There was no sermon that Sabbath.

The next week the old inquiry was made, and the people rejoined, "We know." When the royal preacher said, "If you know you do not need me to tell you." And again an abrupt close to the services.

The third week the people were more wary and replied, "Some of us know, and some do not know." And now they expected to trap the man, but he was wiser than they thought. "Let those who know tell those who do not know," came his utterance, and the people were trapped instead.—Boston Post.

A Rat's Tail.

A rat's tail is a wonderful thing. The great naturalist Cuvier says that there are more muscles in this curious appendage than are to be found in that part of the human anatomy which is most admired for its ingenious structure—namely, the hand. To the rat, in fact, its tail serves as a sort of hand, by means of which the animal is enabled to crawl along narrow ledges or other difficult passages, using it to balance with or to gain a hold. It is prehensile, like the tails of some monkeys. By means of it the little beast can jump up heights otherwise inaccessible, employing it as a projectile spring.

NOTICE

Notice is hereby given that the plats and diagram and estimate of cost of the proposed paving, of Michigan avenue from Dixon avenue north and east to the north line of Lot 15 of Crozier & Burns' unrecorded plat of the city of Charlevoix, have been deposited with the city clerk for public examination.

The district to be assessed for such paving will consist of all lots or parts of lots, lands and premises abutting and fronting on Michigan avenue within the limits above named, excepting streets and alleys.

Notice is also given that the Common Council of said city will meet at the council rooms in said city on Thursday, the 27th day of May, 1909, at eight o'clock p. m. to hear and consider objections to said proposed paving.

Dated May 11th, 1909.

The Captain of the Kansas.

By LOUIS TRACY,
Author of "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," Etc.

Copyright, 1901, by Edward J. Clode.

Kansas with such force that the great ship seemed to flinch from each blow like a creature in pain—Elsie, then, faced by such an intolerable prospect, was a prey to real anxiety because the wearing apparel scattered by Courtenay on the floor was becoming soaked in brine.

She actually stooped to rescue a coat which was not yet saturated beyond redemption. As she lifted the garment a packet of letters tied with a tape fell from its folds. She placed the coat on the writing table and endeavored to stuff the letters into a pigeonhole. They were too bulky, so she laid them on the coat. In doing this she could not avoid seeing the words, "Your loving sister, Madge," written on the outer fold of the last letter in the bundle.

And that brought a memory of her previous visit to the captain's stateroom. She was incapable of reasoned reflection. She felt that if she were failed to live to a ripe old age she would never forget a single detail of the furniture and decorations of the room. She would hear forever the dolorous howling of the gale; the thumping of the waves against the quivering plates, the rapid, methodic thud of the donkey engine, which, long since deserted by its cowardly attendant, was faithfully doing its work and flooding the ship with electric light.

Not thinking in the least what she was doing, she scrutinized the closely tied packet. She wondered idly why he treasured so many missives. Each and every one, oddly enough, was written on differently sized and variously colored note paper, and it could be seen at a glance that they were from as many different people. The outside letter was the most clearly visible. Miss Courtenay wrote a well formed, flowing hand—if handwriting were a clew to character she was a candid, generous, open minded woman.

But what was this? Elsie suddenly threw down the letters. She had read a sentence at the top of the page two before she actually grasped its purport. When its significance dawned on her she flushed violently, for this was what she read:

"I am glad of it, for, because under no other circumstances would I wish to greet and embrace the woman destined to be your wife."

The knowledge that she had involuntarily intruded on Captain Courtenay's private affairs brought her back with a certain slight shock to a sense of actualities. The storm, the horrible danger she was in, emerged from shadowland. Why had he not come for her? Surely there must have been some further mishap! Heavens! Was she alone on the ship, alone with the dead men and the dying vessel? Her head swam with a strange faintness, and she placed a hand to her eyes.

Then Joey sprang in through the doorway and, with that splendid disregard for sentiment displayed by a fox terrier that has just come out of a first rate fight, shook his harness until it rattled.

But he eyed the inrush of the sea with much disfavor, so he leaped up on the table beside Elsie and looked at her as though he would ask why she had permitted this sacrilege.

Though the dog was apparently unscathed and in the best of condition, his head and fore paws were blood stained. His advent dispelled the mist which was gathering in the girl's brain. She feared a tragedy, yet Joey assuredly would not be so cheerful, so daintily desirous to avoid the splashing water in the cabin if his master were injured. The mere presence of the dog was a guarantee that Courtenay had not quitted the ship.

"Oh, Joey," she said, "I wish you could speak!"

The sound of her own voice startled her. She was yielding to nervousness again and was on the point of venturing out, at least as far as the deck house ran, to see if she could distinguish what was taking place on the after part of the vessel, when Mr. Christobal entered.

"I suppose you thought you were forgotten?" he cried, with a pleasant smile, for Christobal would have a smile for a woman even on his deathbed. "There, now, don't try to explain your feelings. You have had a very trying time, and I want you to oblige me by drinking this."

"This" was a glass of champagne which he hurriedly poured out of a small bottle he was carrying into a glass which he produced from a pocket. The mere sight of the wine caused Elsie to realize that her lips and palate were on fire with salt. At the moment she had not the slightest cognizance of her suffering. At the next she felt that speech was impossible until she drank. Never before had she known what thirst was.

"Ah, that is better," said the doctor. "Now, if you don't mind, we shall have the door closed."

With peace suddenly restored to the room and her faculties helped more than she suspected, Elsie began to wonder what had happened.

"Where are the others?" she asked. "and why are you talking things so coolly? Captain Courtenay said"—

"Captain Courtenay said exactly what he meant. But circumstances proved too strong for him. We shall not be able to leave the ship just yet."

"Can't they lower any of the boats?"

"Most decidedly. Two boats have been gone some time. I imagined you knew that. Did not the captain tell you?"

Elsie felt that her companion's glib tone was artificial. Something had occurred which he was keeping from her. She is loved that he had gone to the saloon to procure the wine so that she might have what men called Dutch courage when bad news came.

"I have not exchanged a dozen words with the captain since you refused my help in the fore cabin," she said. "He had other matters to attend to than explaining the progress of events to me. Why cannot you trust me? I shall not scream nor faint nor hinder you in your work. I ask you again, where are the others?"

"You mean Miss Baring and Mrs. Somerville?"

"Yes."

"If they are living, they are far enough away by this time. When their boat was lowered it was cast off prematurely"—

"Purposely?"

"Well, yes. Courtenay had just placed Miss Baring's maid on board when some of the crew let go the ropes. What could we do? We were forced to defend ourselves."

"Is there no other boat?"

Christobal threw out his hands in his characteristic gesture. He was so emphatic that he spilled some of the wine.

"You take it bravely," he said. "I may as well give you the whole story. The first boat lowered was lost through the men's own bungling, the captain says. Then there was a desperate fight for the three remaining craft. Most of the officers were killed. Courtenay got a few of us together when Isobel and Mrs. Somerville joined you here, and we held off such of the madmen as tried to seize the jolly boat. They managed to lower two lifeboats, but between murder and panic not half of the crew escaped in that way. Four men who were left behind promised obedience, and Malcolm, the steward, was placed in charge, with Mr. Gray as second in command. One of the engineers, acting on the captain's orders, brought a can of oil from the engine room and threw it over the side in handfuls. The result was magical. We lowered the boat easily, placed M. de Polnellii on board because he was worse than the women, and then Courtenay, as you know, brought Isobel, the minister's wife, who refused to go without her husband, and the maid. There was room for you and another, so, at the captain's request, Tollemache and I tossed for the vacancy. Meanwhile Courtenay had turned to go for you when we heard a shout from Gray. Two of the Chileans had cast off the ropes which kept the boat alongside. Gray, who was fending her from the ship with the boat hook, jabbed one fellow in the face with it, but he was too late. The boat raced off into the darkness. And here we are!"

That Christobal left several things unsaid Elsie knew quite well. It dawned on the girl that both her elderly friend and she herself were accepting an extraordinary situation with remarkable nonchalance.

"How many of us remain on the ship?" she asked.

"Very few—on the effective list. The captain, an engineer whose name I do not know, Mr. Tollemache and ourselves make up the total."

"Where is Mr. Boyle?"

"Ah, poor Boyle! I fear he is done for. He is very badly wounded. I bandaged him as well as I could, but the call on deck was imperative."

"Is he in the saloon? Should we not go to him?"

"I have only just left him. The hemorrhage has stopped, and I gave him some brandy. Believe me, we can do nothing more for him. I told Courtenay it was quite useless to place him on board the boat. You may be sure he was not forgotten."

"I did not imagine that any one would be forgotten," said Elsie, and for some reason the light in her eyes caused Christobal to go on fiddly:

"We have a whole crowd of injured men on board, Miss Maxwell. At present we can render them no aid. I thought it wisest to obey orders. The captain told me to bring you some wine and remain with you here. It will not be for long."

THE AMERICAN VOICE.

Oscar Hammerstein Tells What Makes a Prima Donna.

The ideal prima donna must compass three requisites to deserve her name—head, heart and vocal chords—and no two are worth half a dozen without the third.

It is strange that no woman reaches her full meaning in the world, especially if she expresses that meaning mechanically, without passing through a sorrowing, struggling past. It is that which molds her, says Oscar Hammerstein in the Delineator. It is the speech of the soul in the child song, in the mother song, the hero song that shuts out the world and helps us to breast the tides which bear us to some new and truer sense of life's vast possibilities. This soul speech is never learned save through one teacher, experience, and, alas, by the time the pupil is perfect in the lesson and knows what it is all good for she is no longer young.

All the possibilities are embodied in the American girl, never heard of in grand opera fifty years ago, but with a record during the latter half of the nineteenth century which foreshadows the future. A few more years will see her a radiant combination of character, beauty, dramatic ability and voice, the ideal queen of song.

When the great people of America, not a few capitalists and devotees of fashion, demand grand opera and make its support the same serious business which continental Europe has done for three centuries we shall not send abroad for our dramatic singers. It was in A. D. 1891 that Tuscan Margarita de l'Epine inaugurated the fashion in England so industriously copied by Patti in America, an annual "positively last appearance." In A. D. 1991 Mary Smith may just as reasonably be expected to hold the Italian populace in thrall by the magic of her American voice.

IMPROVED TEA TABLE.

Maid Presses a Button and the Legs Appear as if by Magic.

As life is becoming more complex inventive geniuses are turning their attention in directions which will help preserve the balance. Inasmuch as the modern household requires a greater variety of furnishings to meet the increased social demands, while the average home occupies less space than formerly, it has been found necessary to manufacture articles of multiple uses. One of the latest of these is the folding tea tray, which is constructed on the principle of the folding sewing table, but is an entirely different article. To see a maid entering the room with one of these contrivances laden with tea, coffee or chocolate, as the case may be, and the accompanying cups, saucers, sugar and cream, the unknowing guest would think she was bearing a tray only. Then when she reaches the spot where her mistress desires the table placed the maid presses with her thumbs two buttons on either side of the tray, and legs spring out from the bottom, as if by magic, transforming the affair into a substantial table.

TRAY AND TABLE IN ONE.

Quick Growing Vines.

To cover unsightly places and to form a harmonious background in your flower garden quick growing vines and tall plants, like hollyhocks and even sunflowers, should be chosen.

Masses of color along fences are often effective. For this purpose no vines are better suited than nasturtiums, sweet peas or some of the many varieties of flowering beans, like the scarlet runner or the hyacinth bean.

Masses of morning glory, ornamental gourd, the moon flower, Japanese hop or wild cucumber may be trained to cover unsightly walls or high board fences. They are also effective when trained over trellises and old trees.

The cypress vine with its delicate foliage and sparkling blossoms is beautiful, but care must be taken in soaking the seeds and planting properly. The cobaea is another tender vine that finds favor.

Some of the hardy climbing plants may be started this spring, so that they will be in the order of succession next year.

Climbing roses, hydrangeas, wisteria, clematis, Virginia creeper, trumpet vines and honeysuckle all have their mission and should be investigated by the ambitious gardener.

And All From Tips.

The man who has the coat and hat stand in one of New York's big restaurants pays $3,000 a year for the privilege. In addition he pays $10 a week to his boys who take the overcoats and hats, keeps them in uniforms, so many suits a year, and makes a great deal of money for himself. How much the public pays in this can be imagined when this system prevails not only in this restaurant, but in many of the big cafes and hotels of the city. The tip at these places is rarely less than a quarter and sometimes is as much as a dollar.

A Famous Penman.

In a little log cabin in the village of Geneva, O., Platt R. Spencer, the author of Spencerian penmanship, first taught writing. The school was familiarly known as "Derlehe" and is fresh in the minds of hundreds of successful men and women in many parts of the United States.

Platt R. Spencer spent the first penny he ever earned as a lad for a sheet of writing paper. He sent by a lumberman to a distant town for it and sat up into the night awaiting his return. Later, at Ashtabula harbor, he wrote the beautiful Spencerian characters, of which he was the author, in the sands on the shores of Lake Erie, and still later, while employed on a small vessel going in and out of the same port, he wrote upon the framework of the cabin at odd moments. He often walked miles to borrow a book and retraced the distance on foot to return it promptly.

When he became a teacher himself, after overcoming many obstacles and hardships, he had little patience with the scholar that would waste his time, but he would stay hours after school to assist the willing pupils. The little log school thus became famous for the successful men and women who received their education under this great man. Spencer was born in 1800 and died in 1864. Besides being a penman and educator he was a poet.—American Boy.

Five Hundred Charlevoix County Patrons Will go to Traverse City in 1909

The next meeting of Pomona, to be held with Marion Center grange June 3, will be the most important meeting of the year, and every patron in Charlevoix county should make an extraordinary effort to be present. At this time, arrangements must be perfected for the trip to Traverse City next December, and each grange should have a representative present. The third and fifth degrees will be exemplified by picked degree teams, and no patron should go home without recieving the degree of Pomona.

The program will be announced next week. Brother John C. Ketcham, of Hastings, has been secured as state speaker. Probably there is no better speaker than Brother Ketcham on the entire list of state speakers, and a rare treat is assured to all who hear him.

Make your plans now to be at Marion Center June 3.

Marion Center Grange No. 956.

Marion Center grange met in regular session May 12 with an attendance of twenty-four.

Officers were all present but steward, assistant steward and lady assistant steward. The usual order of business was transacted.

Mrs. Emmett Coulter was initiated in the first and second degrees. Under good of the order, plans for entertaining Pomona and other interesting subjects were discussed.

The executive committee reported a good time at the dance and turned $7.35 over to the secretary.

On account of degree work the lecturer's program was cut short. Receipts $12.20

South Arm Grange No. 815.

South Arm Grange No. 815 met in regular session Saturday evening, May 14.

The dance committee reported and turned in a balance of $2.83.

Frank Aikens was balloted on and accepted. Recess, after which Frank Aikens was initiated in the first and second degrees.

Moved and carried that we have an ice cream social Thursday evening, May 27. The worthy master appointed committees on supper and entertainment.

Moved and carried that we appoint a fence agent and lightning rod agent, one person to serve in both capacities. Brother H. L. Olney was appointed.

Lecturer's hour was carried out with a wood sawing contest between three of the brothers, also one by a like number of sisters. Brother Irving Crawford and Sister Gertrude Stenke were declared the winners. The prizes are to be awarded next meeting. Several songs and recitations were also given. Cake was passed by Brother Ralph Rainey and Sister Ada Olney both of whom were supposed to have made their respective cakes. They were both very good. Roll call answered to by selections of poetry or a story. Some very unique and amusing responses were the result.

The degree team resolved to exemplify the third degree at Pomona and its up to Brother Ward to find his four-hundred pound candidate.

Grange closed in form.

One application for membership was received.

In answer to the Wilson correspondent's query as to whether South Arm needed any instruction in the art of playing base ball we would say we're not much on base ball, but great on parliamentary law.

NORTHERN COUNTIES LEAD

In Everything According to Crop Report for April.

The precipitation was generally above normal, especially in the southern and central counties. Heavy rain occurred on the 11th and rain, snow and thunder-storms on the 28th and 29th. The temperature averaged from 1 to 4 degrees below normal. High winds occurred on the 7th and the last three days.

The present wheat prospect shows a slight improvement since the issuance of the April report, the average being 78 in the state and 80 in the northern counties.

The average condition on April first in the state 76, and in the northern counties 83.

The per cent of wheat sown that will be plowed up because winter killed, in the southern and northern counties is 4, in the central counties 13 and in the state 6. The damage by Hessian fly in per cent, in the state and southern counties is 2 and in the central and northern counties 1.

The average condition of rye in the northern counties 88 and in the state 85.

The acreage of oats sown up to date, compared with an average for the past five years, in the state, southern and northern counties is 95, and in the central counties 94.

The average monthly farm wages with board, in the southern counties is $21.43, in the central counties $22.24, in the northern counties $23.32 and in the state $23.21. The average wages by the day without board, in the southern counties is $1.31, in the central counties $1.38, in the northern counties $1.40 and in the state $1.42. The average wages in the state last year, by the month with board, was $22.80 and the average wages by the day without board was $1.40.

Fruit correspondents throughout the state quite generally report the prospect for the fruit crop as very favorable at present. The spraying of fruit trees is on the increase. The following table will show the prospect of the present time for a crop of the various kinds of fruit in the state and the different sections:

	State	Nor. Co.
Apples	84	91
Pears	70	83
Peaches	74	83
Plums	70	81

MACHINE MILKING.

Results of Tests Made by the Wisconsin Experiment Station.

A bulletin issued by the Wisconsin experiment station says of machine milking:

"Tests on machine milking covering twenty months with twenty-nine cows, embracing forty separate trials made by the station and just completed, show that machine milking is both practical and economical in herds of twenty cows or more, provided the machine is cared for by an efficient operator. These tests, in charge of Professors F. W. Woll and G. C. Humphrey, were planned to determine the efficiency, economy and effect of the machine upon the cow. A leading type of the vacuum machine was used. Cows were milked continually by machine for periods of four to sixty-two weeks, or an average of twenty-six weeks.

"The effect and efficiency of machine milking on the cows were in general beneficial, most of the cows standing well and showing little shrinkage from change from hand to machine milking, with practically the same average decrease in production as when hand milked. Comparison with preceding periods of hand milking for the same cows showed practically the same average production. Stripping by hand after machine milking was found necessary in most cases.

"The economy of machine milking is due to a saving in time and in help necessary to milk a large herd. About five minutes for each cow are saved where four cows are milked at once and more time when one man operates three machines milking six cows at one time. The cost of operating two machines by electric power was about 4 cents an hour.

"The bacteriological examinations showed that the germ content was slightly decreased and the keeping quality of the milk was somewhat improved by machine milking. Veterinary examinations showed no appreciable effect on the udders or the general health of the cows as a result of machine milking.

"The experience of forty-one dairy farmers covering periods from one month to over two years indicated that a majority of them are favorable to the machine. Some twenty-seven reported favorably, eight were undecided, and six were unfavorable."

Selecting the Brood Sow.

A man of wide experience in swine husbandry writes: "In selecting the brood sow, choose one with a straight or slightly arched back, straight lower line, deep girth, wide up and down, fairly sprung rib, straight legs, plenty of bone, neat head and not less than twelve well developed teats, for a large number of teats is one of the best indications of a valuable brood sow. She should possess a quiet disposition and should be accustomed to being handled, which is of great value in caring for the dam and litter at farrowing."

THE FEEDER.

Do not feed corn to breeding ewes. It is too heating. Give two-thirds oats, one-third wheat bran, with a little oilmeal mixed in. The grain should be selected with care.

Salt as an Appetizer.

Salt makes animals livelier, stronger and more capable of resisting disease. Their flesh is hardier, and the functions of the organs are more regular. Their digestion is better, and they can subsist on fodder that otherwise might be injurious to health. Moreover, with the assistance of salt they can extract more nourishment from a given quantity of fodder, since the flow of digestive liquids is more copious; hence salt is of special importance.

Food For Strengthening Bones.

The Nebraska experiment station reports the effects of different feeds upon the strength of the bones of the hog. Hogs fed corn alone had the weakest bones. Corn and shorts gave bone somewhat stronger. Corn and skimmilk, corn and linkage and corn and ground bone produce increased strength. The bones produced by corn and ground bone were more than twice as strong as those produced by corn alone. The stronger bones were not larger than the others, but the walls were thicker.

Burling the Ewe.

It is often the practice to burl the ewe—that is, cut away the wool on the inside thighs and around the tail and the wool around the udder—before sending the ewes to a distant field. It no doubt is right in theory, but practical men say it is wrong; for should cold east winds prevail gargeted udders will be the result, with the loss of several ewes. Just take away any quite loose wool near the teats which may possibly get into the lamb's mouth and so cause death by swallowing, but do not interfere with nature's protection to the udder until warm weather is assured.

FOR BETTER GRAIN

M. A. C. Experiment Station Pledges Farmers to Raise Products

In order that superior tested varieties of grains, grasses, legumes, etc., which have been procured or produced by the experiment station at M. A. C., may not become lost to all the farmers in the state, Dean R. S. Shaw, director of the experiment station, has introduced an experimental union in which the members of the union pledge themselves to grow grains produced at the station and to report to the director the result of the crop.

It is one of the duties of the experiment station to produce grains for the benefit of the farmers of Michigan. It requires several years to demonstrate the value or lack of the pure strains in a given variety and much time is needed to increase a small trial lot to render its distribution widespread. Soil and climatic conditions vary so much within each state that the results produced by a new variety in any locality may not hold good elsewhere.

The station will send to the members of this union small trial lots which they will grow under certain regulations and report their results to the head office. In this way it will be possible to ascertain how results in various parts of the state compare with those previously made on the college farm and the adaptability of the superior variety to a given locality.

It is part of the plan to have the members of the organization meet annually at the college to compare results and discuss future plans. It is intended later to include trials with corn, grasses and other crops.

How to Bone a Woman's Collar.

The collars on all the waists for women are higher than they have been for years, but, strange to say, they are not at all uncomfortable, for they are cut in such a way that the head can move freely. They are shaped to a comfortable height under the chin and gradually slope up until they almost touch the ears, and from here they follow the line of the hair. It is impossible to keep these collars in place without boning them well, and these bones should be carefully sewed in or else they will dig into the neck when the head is moved. Collar supporters can be bought ready to be sewed into the collar, and any height can be procured. To bone a collar properly one should have five bones, one for the back and two for each side. The one for the middle of the back should be sewed on the right side of the back and should be sewed straight up and down. The two highest bones should be sewed on under each ear and should be slightly slanted. The bones should be slanted toward the back, so that the head can move freely. The smaller bones should be sewed nearer to the front and should be slanted also.

How to Make Caramel Custard.

After cooking half a cupful of sugar to caramel pour in a quarter of a cupful of boiling water, stirring and cooking until dissolved, then add three cupfuls of scalded milk. Beat the yolks of six and the whites of three eggs very light, add half a cupful of sugar and a scant half teaspoonful of salt, dilute with a portion of the hot milk and when smooth stir into the other ingredients, strain and turn into individual molds. Cook in a pan of boiling water till the center is firm and when cold arrange for serving, adding a light browned meringue made of whites of three eggs beaten very light with six tablespoonfuls of sugar and a quarter of a teaspoonful each of salt and almond extract.

How to Make a Cheap Bookcase.

Go to any furniture dealer and get from him three wooden window shade boxes and line them with white moire paper and cover with brown wood colored paper. You may have to buy the boxes, but they will be only about 10 cents apiece. Have a table in your room and place these boxes so they will rest on the table and against the wall. It is best to separate them with wooden boxes of equal size covered with brown paper. This makes a splendid three shelf bookcase in which small books can be placed. If one cares the boxes can be covered with paper to match the room.

How to Treat a Black Eye.

Often in playing a child will run against some object which will hit the eye, and as a bruise on the eye is not only more disfiguring, but more painful, than one anywhere else on the body it is well to know what to do for it. Immediately after the eye has been struck with enough force to make it black apply a cloth wrung out of hot water—as hot as can be borne. Apply new cloths as hot as can be stood for twenty minutes, and the blood which has collected and clotted will become thin and pass off to its proper channels.

How to Care For Snowshoes.

Snowshoes need very little care. You don't have to wipe them dry with a chamois, for instance—the prescribed treatment for skates. When taking them off merely tap them against the wall or a tree to shake free the clinging snow and stand them up on their heels outside. Never attempt to dry them before a fire. When they are put away for the summer select a dry place where there will be no danger of mice.

When you have any new tinware on hand, such as basins, pie plates, muffin pans and cake tins, rub the entire inside surface of the article with a tablespoonful of lard, warm for just a minute on the top of the stove and wipe clean. You will then have no trouble in the future with your tins getting rusty.

CHARLEVOIX COURIER

The Leading Newspaper in the Best Little City Anywhere

VOL. 26. NUMBER 21 | CHARLEVOIX, MICHIGAN, WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 1909 | PRICE $1.50 PER YEAR

WARNER PRAISES THE LEGISLATURE

In Final Message, He Commends Them for Acts Passed

RATE OF STATE TAXATION RAISED

Will be $3.35 Per Thousand this Coming Year

Regrets "Anti-Lobby" Bill Failed to Carry —Game Laws Remain Unchanged.

Gov. Warner seems to be pretty well satisfied with the work of the 1909 legislature. At all events he finds considerable to commend. In his closing message he says, in part:

"The people of the state will commend this legislature for many of its acts and show their appreciation of the care with which appropriation bills have been scrutinized in both houses. I desire to express the opinion that the people of Michigan will find that the state has grown to such proportions that its needs and necessary and proper activities along educational lines, and in respect to the conduct of its various governmental branches and the maintenance of its penal, reformatory and charitable institutions in harmony with sound business principles, and with its dignity and importance, will call for an annual expenditure of $5,000,000. This is a conclusion from which, in my judgment, there is no escape.

"While the appropriations of the present legislature are necessarily larger than those made in previous years, I believe it will be plain, to any fair-minded citizen that if our state institutions, especially those of an educational and charitable nature, are to be properly maintained, these appropriations will never grow less.

"The rate of state taxation in 1907 was $2.81 per $1,000 of assessed valuation. This year it will be $3.35. In 1908 the rate was $2.41, while in 1910 it will be $2.59. The increase, therefore, per $1,000 of assessed valuation this year will be only 54 cents over the corresponding year 1907, while next year the increase will be but 18 cents over the rate of the corresponding year 1908.

"You are to be commended for enacting a better primary election law than the one now on our statute books. Your action in making provision for improving the highways of the state, perfecting the law under which the state railroad commission operates, bettering the liquor laws, guarding the investing public from stock watering and jobbing manipulators, taxing telephone and telegraph companies on an ad valorem basis, and giving municipalities a generous measure of home rule will have unqualified approval.

"It is my earnest conviction that notwithstanding the excellence of the accomplishments of which specific mention has been made and the worthiness generally of the legislation enacted by this legislature, it is to be greatly regretted that the anti-lobby bill, so-called, failed to meet the approval of the house of representatives after being passed by the senate by a practically unanimous vote."

Some of the important measures, which were made into laws:

Home Rule Laws—Three broad bills, granting to cities, villages and counties powers of local legislation contemplated by the new constitution.

Taxation—Telephone and telegraph companies brought under ad valorem tax law; must pay on cash value not on earnings. Will increase state's receipts over $100,000 yearly.

Bierd bill allowing appeal to three non-resident supervisors from action of supervisors in equalizing county valuations.

Verdier bill exempting bonds of cities, townships, counties, villages and school districts from taxation.

Railroad Legislation—Re-enactment of railroad commission bill, broadening commission's powers and removing doubt of law's constitutionality.

Education—Sanders bill allowing townships to form unit school district. Means township high schools if used.

Tuttle bill permitting country school districts to pay tuition of scholars who have passed eighth grade to nearby high schools.

Good Roads—Fox bill codifies highway laws, making it easy for highway commissioner to learn his duties. Many obsolete parts of present laws repealed but all good portions, including county highway law, retained.

Good roads appropriation set at $150,000 yearly through Representative Baker's efforts, $25,000 a year more than state ever spent.

Public Health—Wood bill declaring tuberculosis an infectious disease and prescribing rigid rules for reporting and isolating cases.

Liquor Legislation—Warner-Cramton regulation bill, makes stricter laws for conduct of saloons, general provision for gradual reduction to one to 500.

Dickinson "search and seizure" bill, giving prosecutors greater rights in searching for contraband liquor in dry counties.

Banking Laws—Banking commissioner's salary raised to $5,000.

Savings and commercial deposits to be kept separate in banks whose savings deposits are less than $300,000.

State banks in towns of 2,500 people or less allowed to reduce commercial reserve from 7 1-2 to 3 3-4 per cent and savings reserve from 5 to 2 1-2 per cent. All these department bills.

Currie bill allowing supervisors to name a county depositary providing that interest shall go to county, and exempting treasurers from liability for loss.

Game Laws—Pearson bill protects black bass between February 1 and June 15, limits size to not less than 10 inches and allows not more than 10 to be caught in one day.

The trout fishing season was put back to the old dates, from May 1 to September 1.

For Water Craft—Ball bill bringing vessels that ply in inland waters under practically same restriction as vessels under federal control in great lakes.

Salary Increases—Circuit judges from $2,500 to $3,500; labor commissioner from $2,000 to $2,500; chief of corporation division in secretary of state's office from $1,700 to $2,000; superintendent of public instruction from $800 to $4,000; banking commissioner from $2,000 to $3,500.

Agricultural Legislature—Schantz bill to pay portion of cost when cattle are killed by order of boards of health because of having infectious diseases.

Voting Machines—Collins bill to allow use of voting machines at primary elections.

Expenses of State—State tax budget will be $10,304,000 for the two years, as against $9,100,000 appropriated by forty-fourth legislature. State tax rate in 1909 will be $3.35 per $1,000, as against $2.81 in 1907. In 1910 it will be $2.59, as against $2.41 in 1908.

THIRTY-FOUR YEARS AGO

Leopold Miller Came to Charlevoix County

Death Takes Another of the Early Settlers of this District.

Leopold Miller, a long time resident of this city, died at his home Wednesday morning, May 26, after a long illness, at the age of 84 years. Mr. Miller was well known throughout the county, having located here in 1875.

Leopold Miller was born in Germany in 1824. He was married to Miss Louise Railings at Baden, Germany, in 1853, and moved to New York city the same year, where they remained for two years. They then moved to Toronto, Canada, where they remained 11 years. From there they came to Detroit, at which place they lived for nine years, moving to Charlevoix county, which place has been their home ever since, a period of 31 years.

He leaves a wife and five of the eleven children born to them to mourn their loss. The surviving children are Charles Miller, of Detroit, Elizabeth Olney, Lena Wallace and Anna Miller, of Charlevoix, and George A. Miller, of East Jordan.

The funeral services will be held from the Catholic church Thursday forenoon at 10 o'clock, interment at the Catholic cemetery.

Mayor's Proclamation.

Decoration Day, May 30, coming on Sunday this year, I hereby proclaim Monday, May 31, as Decoration Day, the day on which we should do honor to the memory of our hero dead.

The custom of placing flags and wreaths of flowers upon the graves of those who fought for the cause they knew was right, who left their homes and firesides that the Union might be saved and Old Glory wave over one nation, is a beautiful one and we of Charlevoix should not neglect it. Therefore on Monday, May 31, let us devote our time and thoughts to the courage and manhood that heard the call almost a half century ago.

Let us strew flowers on the graves of those who beneath the sod await the last reveille, and let us do honor to the few veterans whom it has pleased a Supreme Being to allow to remain with us. The Grand Old Army is growing fewer every year, every day sees more and more answer the final roll call; they are marching over yonder by batallions and by regiments—in but a few years they will be gone to return no more. Let us therefore pause in our everyday life and dropping our usual vocations, our sports and games and other holiday features, devote one day out of the 365 to Decoration Day—the Sunday of the dead.

Let Monday, May 31, be given over to the memories of those who have passed, and honor those who are awaiting the summons.

OSCAR G. WILBER, Mayor.

COMPLETE PROGRAM FOR MEMORIAL DAY

Will be Held in This City Monday, May 21

PROCESSION FORMS ON BRIDGE STREET

Will March to Cemetery Headed by C. V. Band

Program Arranged for—All Societies, Lodges, Clubs and Unions Earnestly Requested to Take Part

Memorial day bids fair to be more fittingly and more impressively observed in Charlevoix this year than in previous years. The committee in charge has been laboring hard and earnestly to perfect the arrangements and not only invites but earnestly urges all lodges, clubs, unions and societies to participate, and by their aid help encourage the spirit of patriotism in our little city.

The procession, under the direction of commander H. Berdan, will form on Bridge street at Major E. H. Green's office and headed by the C. V. Band, will move south to the cemetery, where the following program will take place:

Grand opening chorus—Combined Schools.

Invocation—Rev. I. Dewey Ehle, Chaplain of the day.

Reading of official orders—E. H. Green.

Ritualistic work of post.

Reading Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg—Prof. Woodley.

Singing My Own United States—High School Chorus.

Ritualistic work—W. R. C.

Requem—Quartette.

Oration—Judge F. W. Mayne.

America—Normal School.

Benediction—Rev. F. Dewey Ehle.

Decoration of soldiers graves—W. R. C.

In case of storm the program will take place at Bridge Theatre.

The following communication from a committee representing the Charlevoix high school shows a spirit which should be highly commended.

Charlevoix, Michigan.
Captain H. Berdan, Commander of Baxter Post, 119 G. A. R.

Dear Sir:—

In recognition of the patriotic spirit, heroic service and self sacrifice displayed by the brave and courageous men who for four long terrible years of bloody civil strife, fought and died for the perpetuation of the Union so that future posterity might dwell under a stainless and untrameled flag, we the students of the Charlevoix High School, do hereby freely offer our services to the members of Charlevoix Baxter Post No. 119 of the Grand Army of the Republic, in commemorating, on Memorial Day, May 31, 1909, the noble services performed by the boys in blue. Dated this 21th day of May.

COMMITTEE

Headquarters Baxter Post No. 119, G. A. R.

In behalf of Baxter Post No. 119, G. A. R., I beg to acknowledge with many thanks the receipt of your patriotic communication of May 21th inst. in which you freely offer your services to aid the members of this port in commemorating Memorial Day.

HARRISON BERDAN,
Post Commander.

ALDERMAN FRY DEAD

Well Known Resident of Boyne City Passes Away.

Alderman Chas. O. Fry, a well known and highly respected business man of Boyne City, died Wednesday morning after an illness of several weeks. He leaves to mourn their loss a wife and seven children. The funeral services were held Friday afternoon, in charge of the Odd Fellows, of which order he was a member. Mr. Fry was also a member of the Eagles and Orangemen, and those two orders had a part in the funeral exercises. He was forty-two years of age and had lived in Boyne City since 1898.

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS

Met in Petoskey Sunday for Annual Banquet

Over Three Hundred Visiting Knights Present—Charlevoix Knights Attend.

Sunday was a gala day for northern Michigan Knights of Columbus assembled at Petoskey to attend the fifth annual initiation and banquet of Petoskey Council No. 923. Members of the order to the number of 300 were present and were met at the trains by committees and escorted to headquarters at the Cushman House.

At 9:00 o'clock all local and visitors met and at 10 o'clock went in a body to St. Francis church to attend holy mass. At 1:00 o'clock in the afternoon all met at Maccabee hall where the initiatory work took place. Thirty-seven candidates were initiated into the order. At 8:30 in the evening all assembled again at the Cushman House, to enjoy the fifth annual banquet. About 250 sat at the banquet tables.

Thomas Lineman, past grand knight of Petoskey Council, was master of ceremonies. Supreme Knight Carmoody created a new district for this district for the Knights of Columbus, which will include Emmet, Charlevoix, Grand Traverse and a few other counties. D. J. Crowley of Petoskey, will be district deputy.

Those who attended the meeting from Charlevoix were Wm. J. Gallagher, James Gaskin, F. E. Cartier, Louis Orlowski, George, Will and Captain Fruncau, Joe Hallett, Dan Carroll, Mr. and Mrs. Joe Howard, Agnes and Josephine Orlowski and Winnie Weaver.

Miss Squires has re-opened her dressmaking parlors in the rooms over Chapel's Drug Store. She would be pleased to see her old customers at her new quarters.

Manistee Editor Notes Great Changes in this Section

Herbert Harley editor of the Manistee Daily News attended the recent Press Association meeting at Petoskey and this is what he says about this section his write-up:

The editor of the News learned a lot of other things about Petoskey and all that northern country that opened his eyes. The farms are increasing rapidly in number. The villages which spring into being because of lumbering are now agricultural and manufacturing centers and they are thriving wonderfully. It is a great potato country and fruit is becoming a bigger factor all the time. Everywhere timber is looked upon with scorn. Crops are the big thing, and they are never a failure. There is everywhere an air of prosperity. Even the smallest villages are growing and the people all appear satisfied and proud of northern Michigan and glad to live there. They can't be tempted from that beautiful land to Canada, Texas or Cuba.

WIN TWO EXCITING GAMES

Charlevoix H. S. Base Ball Team Takes More Scalps

Shuts Out Crack Harbor Springs Team, Both Games Were Good Ones.

The Charlevoix H. S. base ball team continued its winning streak Saturday by defeating Petoskey H. S. by a score of 6 to 5 in the forenoon at Petoskey, and Harbor Springs H. S. by a score of 2 to 0 in the afternoon at Harbor Springs. Good pitching by the Charlevoix twirlers and excellent field work is largely responsible for the low scores in both games.

The morning game was played with Petoskey. Charlevoix was victorious after 10 innings of exciting ball. A feature of the game was that Poole, of Charlevoix, struck out 20 Petoskey boys. Petoskey only got three hits, their runs being made from errors and base on balls.

Score	R	H	E
C. H. S.	0 0 1 2 0 2 0 0 0 1	6	11	1
P. H. S.	1 0 0 1 1 2 0 0 0 0	5	3	1

The afternoon game played at Harbor Springs was as good a game of ball as has been played by any high school team in northern Michigan for some time. For the first eight innings not a score was made on either side and in the ninth Charlevoix made two runs and shut Harbor Springs out leaving the score 2 to 0.

The game was featured by two great throws, the first by the Harbor Springs center fielder throwing home from medium depth and stopping a run for Charlevoix when it was within three feet of the flat. The second was made in the seventh inning by Hull, of Charlevoix, throwing from deep left field to the plate and checking a run for Harbor Springs, when it was within a foot of the plate.

Powers pitched this game for Charlevoix and gave five hits, no bases on balls, hit no one, and struck out eight. Carey, who is called the best high school pitcher in northern Michigan, pitched for Harbor Springs and gave Charlevoix 4 hits, 2 bases on balls, struck two men and struck out 12.

H. S. H. S.	0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0	0	3	0

Next Saturday the Charlevoix H. S. team will play the Boyne City H. S. team at 2:30 p. m. This will be a good close game as Charlevoix defeated them three weeks ago by a score of 3 to 2. The Charlevoix H. S. second team will also play the Boyne City H. S. second team at 1:00 p. m. Saturday.

The diamond of the Charlevoix High School Athletic grounds are being put in shape so that if it rains before Saturday it will be as good as any high school diamond in the state.

REVIEWS THE BEET SUGAR INDUSTRY

Ernst Grotkass Writes With Authority on Subject

APPROACHING EUROPEAN STANDARD

Farmers are Able and Willing to Grow Them

Observes Great and Satisfactory Progress in the Beet Sugar Culture in this Country in Four Years

One of the most interesting and most important contributions to scientific agriculture, as concerning the cultivation and progress of the sugar beet and its allied industry of sugar making, is the pronouncement recently issued by the eminent German authority, Ernst Grotkass, of Madgeburg, the same being entitled in the unique phraseology of the author: "My last observations about the importance of the beet sugar industry and sugar beet culture in the United States of America." Extracts from the review are as follows, and show the progress made as viewed by a keen and trained observer, as well as showing the general benefits derived from the comparatively new departure in agriculture and in industry:

"The beet sugar industry in the United States has made in accordance with the report I published four years ago, after my first trip through the beet sugar states, a very large and thorough progress.

"Not only have the manufacturers learned to arrange matters in such a way that the unfair competition for beets with all its evil consequences has been nearly abolished but they have also been more careful in the selection of places to erect sugar factories, and now choose only those that have good land adapted to beets and where farmers are able and willing to grow them.

"They have introduced into their factories reforms which enable them to work cheaper and obtain better results, and have with much labor and large outlay of money induced the farmers to pay such attention to beet raising as is absolutely necessary to make a success, both to the farmer and to the factory.

"Constant teaching, constant supervision and judicious help with money, have caused considerable progress in the cultivation of the soil and in the subsequent care bestowed upon the plants. I cannot but pay my highest respect to American perseverance and energy for the results accomplished.

"The difference between the beet fields today and the beet fields I saw four years ago is striking, and I am sure that the near future will show that the Americans are fast approaching European standard, where beets have been grown for more than 100 years.

"In some of the beet-raising districts where rotation has commenced, the fine appearance of grain fields shows the beneficial influence which the better cultivation of the soil, through the medium of beet culture, has had upon succeeding crops.

"When I see the large tracts of land which have been put into high cultivation in Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, New York, Ohio, Illinois and Nebraska, when I see the immense stretches of grass and prairie lands in Colorado, Kansas, Utah, Idaho, Oregon, Washington and California, which latter lands four years ago were almost worthless, compared to the value they have now, I must admit this industry has advanced far beyond my expectations. I am glad to say that no other industry stands upon a firmer foundation than does the beet sugar industry, for the very reason that it rests upon immense tracts of fertile soil with great natural advantages scattered all over the country. Nowhere in the world are there such large tracts of splendid land as in the United States. This is the foundation upon which the country itself rests, the everlasting and never failing source from which it derives its strength.

"Of very great importance is the beet raising towards the increase of branch railroads, which are the natural veins, to supply the main roads with traffic, a sugar factory not only ships the beets in the fall

Striking a Match.

"It's a woman," said Lecoq, the detective, heatedly. "We're on the trail."

"It looks like a man to me," the reporter murmured.

"But didn't you notice how she struck that match," said Lecoq. "She struck it away from her—a sure sign of her sex. Men always strike matches toward them."

After the arrest of the suspect—a woman, sure enough—Lecoq amplified his match statement. "It is tobacco that causes this difference between the sexes in match striking," he said. "All of us unconsciously strike matches toward what we are going to light. Woman always is going to light a lamp or a fire—that is, further off than the match—so she strikes her match away from her. But man is always going to light a pipe or cigarette—that is, nearer so he strikes his match toward him."

Literary Notes

Stranded in Boston.

To the girl without money or friends, Boston is the most hospitable of our big cities, says Lucy Green in the Woman's Home Companion. She has tried them all and she knows. Miss Green, who is only seventeen years old, landed at the South Station, shabbily dressed, with just $5.00 in her pocket, lonely and forlorn, she was cheered by the kindness of the station matron, Mrs. Porter, who guided her to Franklin House. Lucy Green has high words of praise for this hotel for working girls. It is as far as possible removed from the ordinary working girls' home; indeed, has many conveniences, generally lacking in second-class hotels, such as drop-lights in the bedrooms, and private parlors for the use of the patrons. The food is good, the rooms large, yet the board is only $1.00 a week.

From there she went to the Young Women's Christian association to look for work. Here she almost lost her breath on being offered a position with the association itself.

In the course of her travels, Miss Green went to New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Chicago. She tells an interesting story. In conclusion she says:

"In conclusion I simply wish to say that I honestly believe that I look and act very much like the vast majority of girls seeking work in large cities. I believe that I made no greater appeal to the sympathies of the charitably inclined than other girls do. Therefore I am justified in claiming that what I did in all three of these cities any girl possessed of ordinary intelligence and a willingness to work can do find immediate work and shelter that will lead to better things, to business and social advancement and to contentment in the wage-earning field."

Question of Precedence.

Recently a dispute was raised as to whether a certain lawyer or a certain doctor was to have precedence at a function at which both were to play prominent parts. It was impolitic to allow either of these two men to be offended. While the discussion was under way as to which was to be seated next the speaker, an old politician in the room said the discussion was one which he thought he could settle by giving them the words of the great Diogenes, who had said upon an ancient occasion, "Let the thief go before; let the executioner follow after." The politician said he thought that meant the lawyer should have first place and the doctor come next.—Milwaukee Free Press.

An English preacher in the seventeenth century, speaking to the text, "To be or not to be," said that woman should be like and unlike three things. She should be like a snail, always keep within her own house, but not like a snail, to carry all she had on her back. She should be like an echo, to speak when she was spoken to, but not like an echo, always to have the last word. She should be like a town clock, always keep time and regularity, but not like a town clock, to speak so loud that all the town might hear her.—Minneapolis Journal.

THE CAPTAIN OF the KANSAS

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," Etc.

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY EDWARD J. CLODE

CHAPTER VI—Continued.

"Why do you say that?"

"The ship appears to be locked hard and fast on a reef or sand spit. I am told the tide is rising. If that is so our only hope is in the raft which our three allies are now constructing. With a falling tide we might have a breathing space at low water. As it is, well"—

He was interrupted by the opening of the door and the consequent roar of the gale. It was Walker, the engineer, a dark, swarthy man, with a long black mustache which drooped far lowly down the sides of his mouth. He shouted with the inimitable accent of Tyneside:

"Yo' wanted, Doctor Chwistobal. The captain thinks Mr. Boyle is bettaw."

"May I come, too?" asked Elsie.

"No, missie. You bide heaw."

"Please tell me before you go if the ship is full of water."

"She's dwy as a bone," said Walker. A sea splashed over him and sent a shower into the cabin. "A vewy wet bone," he added, with a broad grin for the Northumbrian had a ready wit though he had such a solemn feel and he could not pronounce an "r" to save his life.

So Elsie was left with Joey for company once more. A chronometer showed that the hour was past midnight. She knew sufficient of the sea to understand that the clock was probably accurate, as the course had practically followed the same meridian since the Kansas quitted Valparaiso. So the ship and those left on board had entered on another day. How little she had thought that to be possible when the awful knowledge first came to her that the Kansas was ashore! How long ago was that? Then she remembered that when Courtenay placed her in his cabin with the promise to bring Isobel to her she had noticed the time, 11 o'clock. Was it conceivable that only one hour had elapsed since she and her four footed friend were flung all of a heap into a corner by the impact of the vessel against the sand bank? One hour! Surely there was some mistake. She puzzled over the problem, recounting each event since the conclusion of dinner, and finally convinced herself that her recollection was not at fault.

Joey was becoming restless. He danced backward and forward on the table, where he had taken refuge from the invading flood. Indeed the dog knew long before Elsie that the Kansas was afloat again. At last she noticed that the water in the cabin was gurgling to and fro, and in the same instant she felt the regular swing of the moving ship. She was speculating on the outcome of this new condition of affairs when the door opened and Walker thrust his lantern jawed face within. He grinned cheerfully.

"I've come to fetch you to yo' cabin, miss," he announced. "The ship's under weigh, an' as yo' pwobably am winging wet the captain says yo' ought to change yo' clo'es."

Joey followed her out, but deserted her instantly. She saw the reason when Walker helped her to reach the bridge companion. Courtenay was in the chart house at the wheel. He gave her a friendly nod as she passed. Somehow Elsie felt safe now that the ship was in the captain's hands again.

CHAPTER VII.

WALKER was about to take her to the saloon, whence an inner staircase communicated with the principal staterooms, but she knew that the door leading to the promenade deck had been left unlocked, so she signaled him to lead her the speediest way. Speak she could not. Although there was a perceptible improvement in the weather, Elsie found the wind even harder to combat than when she traversed the deck with Courtenay. This apparent contradiction arose from the fact that during their early dealing with the boats the sailors had cut away the greater part of the canvas shield rigged to protect passengers from adventurous seas.

Nevertheless, all flustered and breathless as she was, she held Walker back when he would have left her in the shelter of her cabin.

"Do spare me one moment," she pleaded. "When I have put on dry clothing, what am I to do? Where am I to go? I will do anything rather than remain alone."

Walker jammed himself in the doorway to break the violence of the unceasing deluge of spray.

"Well, missie," he said, "I'm examining the engines, Mistaw Tollemache is fixing up the donkey-boiler, and Doctaw Chwistobal is with Mistaw Boyle. You know who-aw the captain is, so I weckon yo' best place is the salon."

"Dr. Christobal said you were making a raft?"

"That's wight. But when the ship got off we tackled othaw jobs. She is now in best waft."

"May I not look after some of the injured men?"

"That you can't," was Walker's prompt assurance. "You'd bettaw stick to the salon. I'll tell the captain yo' theaw."

"Tell him? Are you returning to the bridge?"

"Telephone!" shouted Walker, as an unusually heavy sea caused him to slam the door unceremoniously. He failed it too. Not it he could help it would his cheerful voice, not all the storm swept deck matters, be heard.

The electric light glowed brightly in Elsie's cabin exactly as she had left it an hour ago. The ship was one of the anomalous creations of the disaster. It lent a queer sense of mid-Ocean madness to the night's doings. In a few days it would be Christmas, the Christmas of sunshine and flowers known only to that lesser portion of the habitable earth south of the line. In Valparaiso the weather was stifling, yet here not so very far away, it was bitterly cold. And the ship was driving headlong to destruction, though electric locks and switches were at command in a luxuriously furnished apartment, while the engineer had just spoken of the telephone as a means of conversing with the captain. Away down in her feminine heart the girl wondered why Courtenay himself had not come to her. Why had he sent Christobal first and Walker subsequently? Oh, of course he had more urgent matters to attend to, though in the helpless condition of the ship it was difficult to appreciate their precise degrees of importance.

Anyhow, he had sent word that she was to change her clothes, and he must be obeyed, as Dr. Christobal said. Then she discovered as a quite new and physically disagreeable fact that her skirts were soaked up to her knees, while her blouse was almost in the same condition owing to the quantity of spray which had run down inside her thick ulster. She busied herself in procuring fresh clothing and boots. The outcome of the pleasant feeling of warmth and comfort was such as the girl herself would not have guessed in a week. The mere grateful touch of the dry garments induced an extraordinary drowsiness. She felt that she must lie down just for a minute. She stretched herself on the bed, closed her eyes and was straightway sound asleep. At the captain's suggestion Christobal had given her a strong dose of bromide in the wine.

It was better so. If the ship were dashed to pieces against the rocks which unquestionably lay ahead, Elsie would be whirled to the life eternal before she quite knew what was happening. If, on the other hand, some miracle of the sea enabled the men to construct a seaworthy raft in time or, the rising tide permitted the Kansas to escape in so far to run ashore again in a comparatively sheltered position, she would be none the worse for an hour's sleep. And now that the ship was afloat there were things to be done which only men could do. The saloon, the decks, the fore cabin, were places of the dead. Fearing lest Elsie might guess, Christobal before attending to Boyle had thrown tablecloths over the bodies of men slain in the saloon, for Gray and Tollemache had sternly but vainly striven to repress the second revolt. Tollemache and Walker had dragged out of the smothering spray near the port davits three men who seemed to be merely stunned. These, with the chief officer and perhaps four survivors of the explosion, made up the list of living but noneffective members of the ship's company. There was one other, Guglielmo Frascello, who was bawling for dear life in his bunk in the forecastle, but in that dark hour no one chanced to remember him, and it needed more than a human voice to pit itself against the hurricane which roared over the vessel. The unhappy wretch knew that something out of the ordinary had taken place, and he was scared half out of his wits by the continued absence of the crew. Luckily for himself, he did not appreciate the real predicament of the ship or he would have raved himself into madness.

Walker in his brief catalogue of evacuations had suppressed one. To make sure Christobal closed a watertight bulkhead door which cut off the principal staterooms from the saloon. Then he and his two helpers carried out a painful but necessary task. It was his duty to certify whether or not life was extinct. There were very few exceptions. The three men lifted the bodies and threw them overboard. When they reached the corpses of the second officer and a Spanish engineer who had been knifed in the defense of the jolly boat—his comrade had scrambled into one of the lifeboats—Tollemache took possession of such money, documents and valuables as were in their pockets, intending to draw up an inventory when an opportunity presented itself.

Though they knew not the moment when a sickening crash would herald the final dissolution of the ship, they proceeded with their work methodically. In half an hour they had reached the end. All the injured men—seven nondescript sailors and firemen—were carried to the saloon and placed under Christobal's care. Walker dived below to the engine room, where he had already disconnected the rods broken or bent by the fracture of a guard ring, which in turn was injured by the blowing out of a junk ring, a stout ring of forged steel secured to one of the pistons. He could do nothing more on deck. Whether he was destined to live fifty seconds or as many years, he was ill content to hear his beloved engines knocking themselves to pieces with each roll of the ship.

Tollemache, who undertook the firing of the donkey boiler, which was situated on the main deck aft of the saloon for the Kansas was built chiefly to accommodate cargo—during his wanderings round the world had picked up sufficient knowledge of steam power to shovel fuel into the furnace and regulate the water level by the feed valve and pump. The small engine, more reliable and quite as powerful as a hundred men, was in perfect order.

The Kansas rolled heavily. The roll was caused by an experimental twist of the wheel. Courtenay, peering into the darkness through the open window of the chart house, saw that the weather was clearing. He had evolved a theory, and for want of a better, he was determined to pursue it to a finish. The Kansas was being swiftly carried along in a strong and deep tidal current. Happily the wind followed the set of the sea, else there would be no chance of success for his daring plan. His expedient was the desperate one of keeping the vessel in the line of the current, and if day broke before he reached the coast he would steer for any opening which presented itself in the fringe of reefs which must assuredly guard the mainland.

With his hands grasping the taut and in one sense irresponsive mechanism of a steering wheel governed by stern a sailor can "feel" the movement of his ship, a seaworthy vessel being a living thing, obedient as a docile horse to the least touch of the rein. But in the unlikely event of fortune favoring Courtenay to the extent of giving him an opportunity to see the coming danger it was essential that the ship should have a certain radius of action apart from the direction and force of the ocean stream. The two sails were helpful, and it was to assure himself of their efficiency that he put the helm to starboard. The Kansas obeyed with an answering roll to port, showing clearly that she was travelling a little faster than the inrushing tide would take her unaided. He brought her head back to nor'east again and glanced over his shoulder at the ship's chronometer. It was a quarter to 1. Two hours must pass before he would discern the first faint streaks of light. At any rate, if he were spared to greet the dawn it would be right ahead, and, as a few seconds might then be of utmost value that was a small point in his favor. Yet, two hours! Could he dare to hope for so long a respite? How could the ship escape the unnumbered fangs which a storm tornado had thrust far out into the Pacific for its own protection?

He was quite sheltered from the wind and spray in the chart house, and all at once he became aware of a burning thirst. There was water in a decanter close at hand, so he indulged in a long drink. That was wonderfully vivifying. Then his mind turned longingly to tobacco. For the first time in his life he broke the strict rule of the service in which he had been trained and smoked a cigar while on duty.

Now had again he spoke cheerily to the dog.

"Well, Joey, here we are; still got a bark in us?" or "You and I must have our names on the Admiralty chart, Joey. 'Channel surveyed by Captain Courtenay and pup; details uncertain.' How does that sound, old chap?" And again: "I suppose your friend, Miss Maxwell, is asleep by this time. If she calls you, Joey, do you call her Elsie? I rather fancy Elsie as a name. What do you think?" To all of which the dog, who had found a dry corner, would respond with a smile and a tail wag.

The long wait in the darkness would have broken many a man's nerve, but Courtenay was not rust in a mold to be either bent or broken by fear. When his cigar was not in his mouth he whistled, he hummed snatches of songs and delivered short lectures to Joey on the absurdity of things in general and the special ridiculousness of such a mighty combination of circumstances centering on one poor ship as had foregathered to crush the Kansas. Ever since he was aroused from sleep by the stopping of the screw his mind had dwelt on the unprecedented nature of the breakdown. Even before he discovered its cause he was wondering what evil chance had contrived to cripple the engine at such a moment—in the worst possible place on the map.

"Joey," he said suddenly, his thoughts reverting to a chance remark made to him in Valparaiso by Isobel's father, "what did Mr. Baring mean by saying there was a difficulty about the insurance?"

Joey gave it up, but he cocked his ears and looked toward the door. Christobal entered.

"Boyle will recover," he said when he had wiped the spray off his face. "He had a narrow escape. The knife just grazed the spinal cord. The shock to the dorsal nerves induced temporary paralysis, and that rather misled me. He is much better now. Under ordinary conditions he would be able to get about in a few days. As it is, he will probably live as long as any of us."

Christobal waved a hand toward the external void. He was not sailor enough to realize the change in the weather.

"That is good news," said Courtenay. "I thought you would like to know. How are things up here?"

"Better. The barometer has risen an inch in less than two hours. Possibly nearness to the land has some effect, but wind and sea are subsiding."

"You surprise me, yet that is nothing. I have had several surprises tonight. What is the position? Of course we must hit the South American continent sooner or later. Can you fix an approximate time?"

"We are making about six knots, I fancy. If we are lucky and avoid any stray rocks we should see daylight before we reach the coast. That is our sole hope. The ship is in a powerful tidal current, and it is high water at 5:30 a. m. At a rough estimate Hanover Island is twenty knots distant. Now you know all. The outcome is mere guesswork."

"Why did the furnaces blow up?"

"I was cross examining Joey on that point when you came in. He reserved his opinion. My own view is that, by accident or design, some explosive substance found its way into the coal."

"Shem, Ham and Japheth! Explosive substance! Do you mean dynamite or gunpowder or that sort of thing?"

"Something of the kind. That is only a supposition, but when I whispered it to Walker he agreed."

"Walker! Is he the man who speaks so queerly?"

"If you ever go to Newcastle, don't put it that way. I told him to take Miss Maxwell to her cabin. Did he do so?"

"Yes. I have not seen her since, so I assume that the bromide plus the wine was effective. Well, I must return to my patients. Can I get you anything? I am storekeeper, you know."

"No, thanks."

"Nothing to eat or drink?"

"Nothing. I shall be ready for a square meal when I am able to come below, not before."

Christobal smiled. Though he was a brave man, he thought such persistent optimism was out of place. Nevertheless he could emulate Courtenay's coolness.

"Let me know when you are ready. I am an excellent cook," he said.

Then the captain of the Kansas resumed his smoking and humming, with occasional glances at the clock and the compass and the barometer. At 2 o'clock he felt the ship slipping from under the wheel. The compass showed that she was heading a couple of points eastward. He helped her and telephoned instantly to Walker:

"Go forward and try if you can make out anything. Report to me here."

"Aye, aye, sir!" came the reply, and anon Walker appeared.

"It's main thick ahead, sir, but I think we-aw passin' an island to port," said he.

"I thought so. You had better remain here, Walker. We have not long to wait now for the dawn, and four eyes are better than two."

Walker imagined that the skipper was ready for a chat.

"Things are in a dweadful mess below, sir. I can't make head or tail of the smash."

"Well, that must wait. Don't talk. Keep a sharp lookout."

The engineer could not guess that the captain's pulse was beating a little more rapidly with a certain elation. They were undoubtedly passing White Horse Island. It revealed its presence by deflecting the tremendous sea river which bore forward the Kansas onward at such a rate. In fifteen or twenty minutes Courtenay expected to find indica-

BELLE BENSON
at Bridge Theatre

THEATRICAL

The Bijou program of vaudeville presented by Mr. Spencer at the Bridge Theater the last three days of last week was considered by all who saw it the best ever given here. Miss Belle Benson the dainty soubrette won unprecedented outbursts of applause provoked by both her dainty style on the stage and the rich quality of her voice. The team Shepard and St. Angnomon carried the audience from smiles to laughter and then to screams of laughter with their sketch "The Peddler and the Maid."

Mr. Spencer announces that he will play a program the last of this week and promises a very fine entertainment.

Jack Murell the peerless tramp impersonator will be a single on the bill and The Madson Sisters in a singing and talking act. Their voices harmonize beautifully.

Miss Benson will sing the illustrated songs and the best in moving pictures will be shown with change of program each night.

Will be Here Soon.

That very charming fellow, "My Boy, Jack," will return to us this season. He came to us unknown last year and we were a little afraid of him, but after passing a most delightful evening with him and his friends, we extended a most cordial invitation for him to come again. He will be here soon, one of the cleanest, brightest and most up to date young fellows we have ever met. Mr. Eugene Moore, "My Boy, Jack," will renew his conquest of last season and no doubt add many more to his list of friends in this city. No matter what other engagements you may have, put them off, for "My Boy, Jack" will be at the Charlevoix Theatre, Tuesday, June 8.

NOTICE

To the owner or owners of premises hereinafter described:

Notice is hereby given that the report of the Street Commissioner of the City of Charlevoix recommending the construction of sidewalks on the following described premises has been filed in the office of the city clerk and that Tuesday, June 8th, 1909, at eight o'clock p. m. at the council rooms in said city has been set as the time and place for a hearing on the matter set forth in such report and recommendation, at which time and place any person interested may appear and make any objection or suggestion in reference to the construction of such sidewalks as he may deem fit.

The premises described in said report are as follows: South half of lots 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11 and south 73 feet of lot 8 of block 11; south half of lots 5 & 6 of block 14; lots 1 & 4 and south half of lots 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8 and west 25 feet of lot 11 of block 16; abutting on Antrim Street; lots 9, 10, 11, 12 and west 11 feet of lot 13 of block 7; lots 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 and 19 of block 13; lots 2, 3, 4, & 5 of block 15 abutting on Mason street, all of original plat of City of Charlevoix. North 54 feet of lots 1&2 of block 8 of City of Charlevoix, abutting on Mason street. All lots on block 1 of Mason's addition to City of Charlevoix abutting on North Bridge Street; lots 80, 81, 136 & 137 of Upright & Hurlbuts Addition to the City of Charlevoix; all lots in blocks 3 & 4 of Fox & Katons unrecorded plat of said city abutting on Petoskey Avenue.

THEATRE TALK NO. 5.

ONE OF THE IMPORTANT FIRST CLASS PRODUCTIONS OF THE SEASON, "MY BOY, JACK," WILL BE SEEN HERE IN A FEW DAYS. The play was written by Edwin Milton Royle, author of "The Squaw Man," the most famous Broadway success of recent seasons, "Mollie Moonshine," which Marie Cahill found one of her most popular productions, "Capt. Impudence" and other noted plays. The company will have for its head and star EUGENE MOORE, who will be remembered for his brilliant performance of "Monte Cristo" and his high position among leading men and the cleverest light comedians. MR. MOORE SHINES BRIGHTLY IN THE PART OF JACK, and nothing could be better suited to the taste of American theatregoers than the character of this independent, worthy young son of a typical American business man. THE OPPORTUNITIES IN THE PART TO SHOW THE ACTOR'S ART in delineating a vivacious personality with a keen play of wit and humor, through which is seen true strength and nobility of character, are seldom excelled in any play. MR. MOORE IS ONE OF THE FEW ACTORS IN THE COUNTRY WHOSE WIDE AND COMPLETE EXPERIENCE and high ideals equip them to convey the full excellence of such a role. The other parts in the play are all of unusual interest, including the musician Karje, Margeret the prima donna, her dissipated father, and the landlady of the poet and composer in their poverty. The whole play is full of the best kind of entertainment the stage offers, and presented thoroughly well. There are four acts which carry the story from the poor lodgings of the poet and musician through the handsome apartments of the prima donna and the mansion of her rich admirer to the green room of the opera house. You wont see any thing better is town this season than this production. STAR, PLAY AND COMPANY IS ALL THAT COULD BE DESIRED. Don't wait until the last minute to buy your tickets and then grow if you don't get good seats. WE'RE EXPECTING YOU and will give you the greatest value you have ever had for your money. NO CHEATING WITH THIS COMPANY. Usual prices will prevail.

Neighborhood Notes

Last Wednesday morning about nine o'clock, Arthur Tower who was walking on the Clarke dock, discovered a body lying in the water, and notified the authorities who promptly took the body out of the water, and it proved to be that of Robert Thompson. He had evidently been in the water all night as he did not appear at his home and had been fishing. He was an expert swimmer, but had on a pair of rubber boots which probably held him down after he fell into the water. The body was taken to the home of his mother, Mrs. Maggie Bogart, who had a sleepless night, and, in a troubled dream had seen his lifeless body in the water. He was about twenty-five years of age, unmarried, and leaves his mother and aged grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Smeltzer, to mourn his death. Harbor Springs Graphic.

Mrs. Emma Olmstead wife of Henry Olmstead, of near Mt. Pleasant, committed suicide at the Northern Michigan asylum at 9 o'clock Thursday by swallowing one ounce of carbolic acid. She was 46 years old and had been at the institution about six months, suffering from melancholia and nervous depression with suicidal tendencies.

Elmer Mayne had a narrow escape from what might have been a serious injury Sunday morning while engaged in his duties at the Hydraulic Power and Light Company's lighting plant at Ellsworth. He was sitting in a chair near the east side of the building when a nut two inches across and weighing a pound and a half flew off a clutch on the line shaft, just missing his head, making a large dent in the plaster on the wall.

One of those cases of beat your wife on Sunday, get arrested on Monday and go to Detroit on Tuesday, came to light last week at Petoskey when Frank Zaremski was arrested for beating his wife with a chair and taken before Justice Worden, who found him guilty and sentenced him to 90 days in the Detroit House of Correction. Zaremski is reported as being a good-for-nothing who compelled his wife to do all kinds of hard work in order to support herself and family, so his absence from the home will not be greatly felt.

A blacksmith at Temple claims to have found the lost art of tempering copper. He is said to have made a razor blade of copper that holds an edge equal to the finest piece of razor steel and the same report states that he made a copper drill with which he bored a hole through a flat file. He applied for a patent and was sent several bars of copper to temper. This he did, returned them and is offered an immense sum for his discovery, but he has thus far refused to consider a sale of the secret.

REVIEWS THE BEET SUGAR INDUSTRY

of the year and through the winter it also supplies freight all through the summer by getting coal, limestone, bags, barrels and the immense amount of other necessaries for a campaign.

"A very large stimulant is in its propogating the building of stone roads, which in return induce the farmer to more intense cultivation of his fields, as it facilitates bringing his products easily to the market and thereby enhancing the value of the lands. No article in the world proves the proverb "that one wedge drives another" to be as true as does the sugar beet.

"Beet raising means an increase of grain and meat production and an increased consumption of artificial fertilizer and agricultural implements of all kinds, a great deal of traffic and trade finds its source in the sugar beet, and for the insurance and banking business it means an increase of hundreds of millions to be handled.

"But of far greater importance than the above is the immense increase of national property through the agency of changing comparatively cheap or worthless lands into lands of high value.

"If I take as an example the land around the sugar factory at Sterling, and at Sugar City, Col., as well as around Garden City, Kas., Holley Lamar, Rockford, Co., which I have been offered at $8 to $20 per acre, and now are really selling at $100, and take only an increase in their actual value of $80 an acre, this would yield a quick increase of $70,000,000 in the value of farm property, which amount would ultimately be greatly enlarged when such lands command from $50 to $80 an acre, according to their productive capacity, a price which they already have attained in some parts of the beet district. The beet sugar industry is better adapted than any other to promote irrigation and thus change countless acres of now useless lands into districts where wealth will abound. No crop in the world repays with such a certainty the labor bestowed upon it as does the sugar beet crop. Neither drouth, nor hail, nor too much rain is able to destroy the beet plant as completely as other crops. In every other crop is a failure, the beet crop will always, even under the most adverse circumstances, pay the farmer some returns for his labor.

"No other crop has such an even price as the beet crop and upon nothing can the farmer count as certainly as on the sugar beet because he is always able to contract his crop at a fixed price a year ahead.

"Of no less importance is the beet sugar industry in exercising the mental faculties of every farmer. It compels him to use his brains. It sets his to work to find means to raise his tonnage by dint of rotation and judicial fertilizing. It compels him to have better horses and better implements. The increase of his grain crop makes him take interest in the world's market. It drives him to educate himself and make himself familiar with chemistry and mechanical contrivances. It exercises his general knowledge and calls for more scientific education. It stimulates his pride and urges him not to be behind his neighbor. His larger gains, as well as the increase in value of his land, enables him to do all this.

"Such has been the case everywhere in Europe where the beet sugar industry has become established. Wherever you go in Europe you find the best cultivated soil, the finest houses and farm buildings, the most agricultural schools, the best horses and animals of all kinds in that part where the beet sugar industry thrives. It would be of great importance to the development of the beet sugar industry in the United States if the leading men of all classes of this country, as well as capitalists, would take a trip to Europe to inform themselves and get correct ideas of the vast interests centered in the beet sugar industry in Europe.

"As far as I can see the beet sugar industry needs no premiums and no other protection than the one it has now. What it needs more than anything else is the certainty of peace and quietness for at least a period of 15 to 20 years, so that investors may go about their work without having to fight one year against the Philippines and the next year against Cuba and the next against something else that threatens to upset in a few months the work of years. Any industry based upon agriculture must, necessarily, be able to count upon years of unchanged conditions, as it takes years to adapt present agricultural methods to it, so that they will conform to the conditions of the new industry. The farmer is not able to change his production, like a tradesman, by buying new machinery and the next day turning out a new article. Nature works slowly and the farmer must bide his time before he can change his production. The beet sugar industry cannot be called into life at a moment's notice and leave off again the next year. It is an industry to last and increase as long as there is soil to produce beets. Such an industry must have time ahead in which its friends can count on undisturbed labor and industrial conditions. An industry of such magnitude, of such importance to the welfare of this country, ought to have such treatment.

"If these few words should tend to give you an idea of what the beet sugar industry means to the United States, I shall be glad to have accomplished this object and hope you will enlist as a friend and protector of this home industry.

"Yours very truly,

The fishing was bad. Even the judge, who had whipped the pools above the Little Beaver for years, would not remember a day when the trout had ignored the tempting flies so persistently and autocratically.

When they gathered on the bank of the stream for lunch the judge, the bishop and the banker, the subject of a blog, after a few tart remarks by the judge and the banker which made the bishop elevate his eyebrows in mild reproof, was tactfully avoided.

So eager were they not to mention or even think of those miserable trout that they talked of everything, anything, and finally the conversation drifted into an unfettered channel.

"Romance," said the judge abstractedly, taking up a remark of the banker, "is dead. There is no room for it in this hustling age. It has gone the way of sentiment and old time courtesy and the gentlemen of the old school."

"Good riddance to it," said the banker lazily. "Let it go. It has given way to better things, good horse sense, for instance."

The bishop looked at the purling water. He was a gray haired man, with kindly eyes and the most winning smile. He was smiling now as he turned to the two men.

"You are both wrong," said he, with deep conviction. "Romance is eternal. You can't kill it with a club or with hustle. But, of course, you two would not admit it even if you saw it."

The judge bristled. The banker roused himself, and his pipe glowed like a blast furnace.

"Romance," growled the judge, with carefully ungleasant emphasis. "You

"IRREGULAR, MUST IRREGULAR," SAID THE BISHOP.

old cloistered dreamer, you want to rub elbows more with the world."

"Dollars and cents, dollars and cents," chanted the banker. "That's what the world is really after."

The bishop smiled with patient toleration. "Dear, dear, I'm glad I haven't the perspective of you two," he said. "What a queer world you see through your black goggles! Romance! Why, that's what makes the world go round."

The banker and the judge exchanged knowing winks. They looked at the bishop with unconcealed pity.

"Speed up a bit and catch up with the procession," the banker advised.

"Perhaps you're the ones that are behind it," the bishop suggested, with a chuckle. "That reminds me," he continued, "just twenty-five years ago, on this very spot, when I was a young minister, I was fishing here alone. You know Robert Harding, of course, you two," he interrupted himself—"fine, cynical beggar like you; never saw any romance in life and is all dollars and bustle, isn't he?"

"Well, so he is," growled the judge. "What's Robert Harding got to do with romance?"

"Oh, nothing much now, I suppose," laughed the bishop, "only it happens that twenty-five years ago there was a big camp of city people a few miles from here, and Robert Harding and May Fenelon were there with their parents. Those parents most unromantically had arranged unpleasing matches for those two, and they jumped into a canoe one morning and paddled down here and got me to marry them."

"Wouldn't have thought it was in him," said the banker. "Hello! Who's this?"

Down the stream came a canoe driven by the powerful strokes of the man at the paddle. In the bow was an attractive—a decidedly attractive—girl, who also essayed to paddle, but whose strokes really counted for little except as "moral support," as the bishop suggested chucklingly.

As soon as the man in the approaching canoe saw the little group on the bank he stopped paddling, looked sharply at the bishop and swung the craft to the bank.

"Are you Bishop Hale?" he asked excitedly.

"I am," the prelate admitted.

The young man turned quickly to the girl who was flushing so beautifully that the judge and the banker forgot "hustle" and "dollars."

"What luck!" said the young man. "We were on our way to your camp, sir, well you may try it."

"Well, well," said the bishop. "Who are you, and what are you, and where did you come from, my eager young candidate?"

The young man stuttered. "We're from the camp at the forks, just above here. This is an elopement, sir. We are running away from cruel parents at any rate, they're bothering each of us to marry some one else, you know."

"Irregular, most irregular," said the bishop. "I have never married anybody outside of my life except—However," he went on quickly, to hide the blank expression of dismay on the two faces, "that doesn't matter to it may not act. Explain, if you please, very briefly, the circumstances that have induced you to—er—to take this step."

"A man with money and lots of power in his father's business," replied the young man, "who has plans for the lady's position. As for mine, I'm a wealthy young woman whose parents object to—to—prefers a study because she has so determined."

"I see," said the bishop. "You didn't tell me your name."

"Robert Harding," said the man in the canoe.

The judge and the banker both uttered a shout. "Did you speak?" asked the bishop sweetly, turning to them. Then he turned to the girl. "Do you fully realize the import of this step?" asked he.

"Indeed I do," said she. "If you'll please." She glanced apprehensively over her shoulder in the direction from which they had just come.

The bishop's face was determined.

"Land!" he commanded. As the canoe shot to the bank it was the bishop himself who helped the girl out.

"Stand here—so, beneath this fir," he instructed. "Ned, Will," he went on, turning to the judge and the banker, "you two take your places here on the right. I haven't a prayer book with me, but I think I can go through the service with no omissions. You have no ring? Not, let me have that ring of yours. If it's too large," he told the girl, smiling, "you can wrap it with a bit of string."

Through the still forest sounded the deep tones of the bishop's splendid voice. And all through that service there was a look of triumph on the bishop's face, and that look was reflected at the wondering judge and the equally astonished banker.

The bishop, the judge and the banker, in the order named, had each kissed the bride. The canoe, with the young man bending to the paddle and the girl in the bow, had departed downstream, bombarded by pine needles, which the judge and the banker threw prodigally in lieu of rice.

It was only when Pierre, the head guide, touched the judge on the shoulder and declared they must certainly be starting if they wished to get downstream that night that the three men filed silently toward their forgotten canoes.

"Well," laughed the bishop, "for a saintly, cloistered, out of touch with the world dreamer I seem to have made a pretty fair guess about this romance business. Who's behind the procession, Will? Just tell me that, if you please."

The banker grunted.

"Back up, Baptiste," urged the judge to the guide in his canoe. "I suppose I must admit that romance got somewhat of a lease of life just now, but I don't care to encounter the irate parents that will be on its trail."

"Not a bad idea to keep in the dark for a bit," the bishop chuckled and added to the guide, "A little more steam, Jean."

The Watch of Wren's Sweetheart.

The betrothed of Sir Christopher Wren, the architect of St. Paul's cathedral, accidentally dropped her watch into a bucket of water. Knowing that her lover was an ingenious man, she sent it to him to be repaired. Wren's reply ran as follows: "Madam—The artificer, having never before met with a drowned Watch, like an ignorant physician has been soe long about the cure that he hath made me very unquiet that your commands should be soe long deferred. However, I have sent the watch at last and cavle the fellicity of it, that it should be soe neer your side and soe often enjoy your Eye and be consulted by you how your Time shall pass while you employ your hands in excellent workes. But have a care of it, for I put such a Spell into it that every Beating of the Balance will tell you 'tis the pulse of my Heart which labors as much to serve you and more Trewly than the watch, for the watch I believe will sometimes lie, and sometimes perhaps be idle and unwilling to goe, having received so much injury by being in that bath that I dispair it should ever be a True Servant to you more. But as for me unless you drown me too in my Teares you may be confident I shall never cease to be your most affectionate, humble servant. Chr. Wren."

Entitled to Them.

After the new arrival had registered the hotel clerk looked down the page and read, "Jeremiah Greatchap, XXXX, Skeezlxville."

"What do all those X's mean after your name?" queried the officer.

"That means a lot," explained the new arrival. "I'm ex-school director, ex-township trustee, ex-county commissioner and ex-mayor. See?"—Kansas City Independent.

HE READ HIS MAN.

Lincoln's Rebuke to a Visitor Who Would Not Meet His Gaze.

As I came up to the railing in front of the president he was reading a paper that had just been presented to him by a man who sat in the chair opposite him and who seemed by his restlessness and unsteady eyes to be of a nervous disposition or under great excitement.

Mr. Lincoln, still holding the paper up and without movement of any kind, paused and, raising his eyes, looked for a long time at this man's face and seemed to be looking down into his very soul. Then, resuming his reading for a few moments, he again paused and cast the same piercing look upon his visitor.

Suddenly, without warning, he dropped the paper, and, stretching out his long arm, he pointed his finger directly in the face of his vis-a-vis and said, "What's the matter with you?"

The man stammered and finally replied, "Nothing."

"Yes, there is," said Lincoln. "You can't look me in the face! You have not looked me in the face since you sat there! Even now you are looking out that window and cannot look me in the eye!"

Then, flinging the paper in the man's lap, he cried: "Take it back! There is something wrong about this! I will have nothing to do with it!" And the discomfited individual retired.—T. B. Bancroft in McClure's Magazine.

ORIENTAL PARAGONS.

Japan's Four and Twenty Models of Filial Piety.

Filial piety, as is well known, is the special virtue of China and Japan. From it springs loyalty to the emperor, who is regarded as "the father and mother of his people." There are no greater favorites with the Japanese than the "four and twenty paragons of filial piety," whose acts of virtue are the subjects of Chinese legend.

One of the paragons had a cruel stepmother, who was very fond of fish. Never repining at her cruel treatment of him, he lay down on the frozen surface of a lake. The warmth of his body melted a hole in the ice, at which two carp came up to breathe. These he caught and took home to his stepmother.

Another paragon, who was of the female sex, clung to the jaws of a tiger that was about to devour her father until the latter escaped.

The direst of all these stories is that of Borashi. This paragon, though seventy years old, used to dress in baby's clothes and crawl about on the floor, his object being to delude his parents, who were really over ninety years of age, into the idea that they could not be so very old, after all, as they had such an exceedingly infantile son.—Sunday Magazine.

"Lady," said Plodding Pete as he finished the luncheon which had been provided, "I said I'd do me best to help out wid de woodchoppin'."

"That's what you said."

"An' I'm a man of me word."

"Then why don't you reach for the ax and go to work?"

"Lady, I merely took de contract. I didn't guarantee to do de work myself. I'm a telepathic woodchopper, an' if you don't disturb me while I'm concentratin' me thoughts I'll surprise you. Jes' remember if anybody walks up like he's half awake an' goes to work on dat wood dat I'm de grateful party who mesmerized him."—Washington Star.

The bright red phonograph sang long and loud at an east side cafe. When it finished the people clapped. It replied with an encore, and the people clapped again.

"What makes you look at it so hard?" asked the woman's companion, for her eyes were fixed on the phonograph.

"I am just waiting," she said, "to see it get up and bow."—New York Press.

tions of a more northerly set of the tide, and he watched the compass intently for the first sign of this return to the former course. If the ship crossed the current one way or the other she would certainly be driven ashore on some outlying spur of the island or detached sunken reef; hence he must actually guess his way, with something of the acquired sense of the blind, because the slight chance of ultimate escape for the ship and her occupants rested wholly on the assumption that some ocean hyway was leading her to a deep water inlet, where it might be possible to drop the anchor.

In eighteen minutes or thereabouts the needle moved slightly. Courtenay once more assisted the ship with the helm. She steadied herself, and the compass pointed due northeast again.

Walker, though an engineer, knew enough of navigation to recognize the apparent impossibility of the captain being able to steer with any real knowledge of his surroundings. The wheel twisting therefore savored of magic. But his orders were to look ahead, and he obeyed.

Soon he thought he could discern an irregular pink crescent, with the concave side downward, somewhere in the blackness beyond the bows. Speedily it was joined by two others equally irregular and somewhat lower.

"Captain, d'ye see you?" he asked in a voice tremulous with awe.

"Yes. That is the sun just catching the summits of snow topped hills. It not only foretells the dawn, but is a sign of the weather. There are no clouds over the land or we should not see the peaks."

Ere long a silver gray light began to dispel the gloom. The two silent watchers first saw it overhead, and the vast dome of day swiftly widened over the vexed sea. The aftermath of the storm spread a low, dense cloak of vapor all round. The wind had fallen so greatly that they could hear the song of the rigging. Soon they could distinguish the outlines of the heavy rollers near at hand, and Courtenay believed that the ship in her passage encountered in the water several narrow bands of a bright red color. If this were so, he knew that the phenomenon was caused by the prawn-like crustacea which sailors call "whale food," a sure sign of deep water close to land and, further, an indication that the current was still flowing strongly, while the force of the sea must have been broken many miles to westward.

Suddenly he turned to Walker.

"Do you think you could shin up to the masthead?" he asked.

"I used to be able to climb a bit, sir."

"Well, try the foremast. Up there I am fairly certain you can see over this bank of mist. Don't get into trouble. Come back if you feel you can't manage it. If you succeed, take the best observations possible and report."

Courtenay was becoming anxious now. If he dared let go the wheel he would have climbed the mast himself. Walker set about his mission in a businesslike manner. He threw off his thick coat and boots and went forward. Halfway up the mast there was a rope ladder for the use of the sailors when adjusting pulleys.

"My God, we-ah on the wocks!"

The rest of the journey was not difficult for an athletic man, and Walker was quickly an indistinct figure in the fog. He gained the truck all right and instantly yelled something. Courtenay fancied he said:

"My God, we ah on the wocks!"

Whatever it was, Walker did not wait, but slid downward with such speed that it was fortunate the rigging barred his progress.

And then, even while Courtenay was shouting some explanation, a great black wall rose out of the deep on the port bow. It was a pinnacle rock high as the ship's masts, but only a few feet wide at sea level, and the Kansas sped past this ugly monitor as though it were a buoy in a well marked channel.

Courtenay heard the sea breaking against it. The ship could not have been more than sixty feet distant, a mere boat length from her own beam, and he fully expected that she would graze again. Some critter in the next lagoon, had the Kansas had a charmed life. She ran on unscathed and seemed to be traveling in smoother water after this escape.

Walker's dark skin was the color of cartridge when he reached the chart house.

"Captain," he said weakly, "I'll do awl wi' engines, but I'm no good at this game. That thing fairly banged me. Did ye see it?"

"Did you see land?" demanded Courtenay imperatively. His spirits rose with each of these thrills. He felt that it was ordained that his ship should live.

"Yes, sir. There-aw's hills, and lots ones, a long way ahead, but I'm not goin' up that mast again. It would be suicide. I'm done. I'll never forget you stone ghost—no, not if I live to be ninety."

CHAPTER VIII

FORTUNE has her cycles, whether for good or ill. The Kansas, having run the gauntlet of many dangers, seemed to have earned an approving smile from the fickle goddess. A slight but perceptible veering of the wind could feel with the increasing power of the sun's rays, swept the ocean clear of its storm wraiths. Soon after passing the pillar rock Courtenay thought he could make out the unwavering outline of mountainous land amid the gray mists. A few minutes later the waves racing alongside changed their leaden hue to a steely glitter which told him the fog was dispersing. The nearer blue of the ocean carpet spread an ever widening circle until it merged into vivid green. Then, with startling suddenness, the curtain was drawn aside on a panorama at once magnificent and amazing.

Almost without warning the ship was found to be entering the estuary of a narrow fiord. Gaunt headlands carved on a titanic scale out of the solid rock guarded the entrance and already shut out the more distant coast line. Behind these first massive walls, everywhere unscalable and rising in separate promontories to altitudes of perhaps 400 feet, an inner fortification of precipitous mountains flung its glacier clad peaks heavenward to immense heights—heights which in that region soared far above the snow line.

But if the crests of peak upon peak were clothed in white their recesses were a garment of different texture. Save on the seaward terraces of stark rock, with their tide marked base of weed covered boulders, the densest vegetation known to mankind imposed everywhere a first barrier to human progress far more unconquerable than the awesome regions beyond. Pine forests of extraordinary density crammed each available yard of space until the tree growth yielded perforce to hardier Alpine grass and lichens. This lower belt of deepest green ranged from 500 to 1,000 feet in height, as conditions were adverse or favorable, and waterfalls abounded.

Courtenay, after an astounded glance at the magnitude and solemn grandeur of the spectacle, had eyes for naught save the conformation of the channel. The change in the wind was caused, he found, by the northerly headland thrusting its giant mass a mile or more westward of its twin, but he quickly discovered from the conformation of the land that the latter was really the protecting cape of the inner waterway. He reasoned, therefore, that the deep water channel flowed close to the northern shore until it was flung off by the relentless rocks to seek the easier inlet behind the opposite point.

He did not know yet whether the ship was entering some unknown strait or the mouth of a narrow landlocked bay. If the latter, the presence of the distant glaciers and the nearer torrents warned him of a possible bar on which the Kansas might be lost within sight of safe anchorage. Not inspired guesswork now, but the skill of the pilot, was needed. This crossing the bar in broad daylight was as great a trial of nerve in its way as the earlier onward rush in the dark.

Wind and sea had abated so sensibly that the Pacific rollers raced on unbroken, and it was no longer a superhuman task to make one's voice heard along the deck.

So the captain aroused Walker with a sharp order:

"Go and see if the donkey boiler has a good head of steam. We may have to drop the stream anchor quick and both bowers as well. If Tollemache is doing his work properly, go forward and keep a sharp lookout for broken water. Clear off the tarpaulins, and be ready to lower away the instant I sing out."

Walker, who had been gazing spellbound at the majestic haven opening up before the ship, hurried on his errand. He found Tollemache seated on an upturned bucket, in which the helmsman one had just washed his face and hands.

"Have you seen it?" demanded Walker gleefully, while his practiced eyes took in the state of the gauges as he overran a number of oil taps with nimble fingers.

"Seen what?" asked Tollemache without removing his pipe.

"The land, my bonny lad. We-ah wunnin' wight in now."

"We've been doing that for hours."

"Yes, but this is diff'went. The-aw's a fine wiv-ah ahead. Have ye ev-ah seen the Tyne? Well, just shove South sheels an' Tynemouth a few hundred feet high-ah an' you've got it. Now, don't twy to talk or you might cwack yo' face."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

"Now that you are rich, Mrs. Mudger, do you feel any happier than when you had to pack your husband's lunch in a little tin box every morning?"

"Oh, yes—much. I know that he will not blame me for it if his lunch doesn't happen to appeal to his appetite."

A DEADLY CONTEST.

Tragic Climax of a Bicycle Race In Australia.

One of the most singular events in the annals of athletics occurred a few years ago at Sydney, Australia. The occasion was a great electric light bicycle race, and the attendance was not less than 10,000 people. There were fifty entries, two of whom, James Somerville and Percy Cliff, were not only professional rivals, but deadly enemies. Both were considered expert riders.

From the start of the race Somerville led, with Cliff a close second. Somerville kept the lead throughout and came into the last lap with Cliff only a few feet behind him. When about twenty-five yards from the finish Somerville put on a terrific burst of speed and drew away from his rival. Suddenly at this point his grip on the handle bar relaxed, and he fell forward. The machine, however, under the tremendous impulse it had received, raced ahead like an arrow, the rider hanging limply over the handle bar.

Four yards from the tape the machine slowed down a little. At this point the front wheel of Cliff's machine struck the hind wheel of Somerville's, sending both wheel and rider across the tape. Somerville won the race, but he was dead several seconds before he crossed the tape.—Chicago Record-Herald.

ANCIENT DOCTORS.

Some of the Things They Knew Twelve Hundred Years Ago.

The Russian Academy of Medicine after examining a Tibetan "Handbook of Medicine," first published 1,200 years ago, acknowledges that it contains many truths discovered or rediscovered by modern physicians. Here are some extracts from the ancient volume:

"Number of bones in the human body, 360; number of nerves, 99; number of pores, 11,000,000.

"The heart is the king of the organs and the staff of life. The lungs embrace it as a mother does her child. Sicknesses are due to man's malice, ignorance and inability to curb the passions, for these things interfere with the proper nourishment of the human organs. All unkind thoughts react upon the heart and liver."

The methods for ascertaining the state of a person's health were very similar to those methods employed today—looking at the tongue, feeling the pulse, etc. Vegetable medicines are advocated; also baths, compresses, massage, bloodletting, etc. Fines were imposed upon physicians who did not keep their instruments clean.

A Fearless Prince.

Victor Emmanuel when prince royal held the rank of colonel in a regiment of artillery, and Humbert I. was on the throne. A new explosive had been invented, and the young prince was invited to be present at some experiments that were to be made with it. At the first shot the cannon being used burst with terrific force, scattering pieces of metal in every direction, but luckily not seriously injuring any one. Nevertheless the natural impulse to fly from danger seized officers and experts alike, and off they rushed with more unanimity than dignity. Only Victor Emmanuel remained at his post. He watched them for a moment and then, in a quiet tone of kingly tenor, called them back.

"No use running now," he said, with a ghost of a smile playing about his lips. "All danger is over."

Pet Names.

Every one likes to see husband and wife on affectionate terms, but Snaggsby, the toyshop keeper, rather overdid the thing. Little Johnny Biggs had sixpence, and he had bought a toy, but little Johnny's fancy is wayward, and he discovered that a clockwork railway engine was poor fun compared with a horse and cart, after all. Therefore he went to change the railway engine. "You say you bought this here yesterday?" said Snaggsby dubiously. "Who served you?" "The—goosey gander, sir!" said Johnny, pointing to Mrs. S. And when Snaggsby remembered that he had so addressed his wife in the presence of the boy on the day previous he flushed a pretty pink and changed the toy.—London Sphere.

The Sight of the Pigeon.

A friend of mine ridicules the idea that in the carrier pigeon it can be sight which guides it on its homeward trail. But my friend should really study the mechanism of the eye of the bird before he skepticizes. I am sure that from heights at which it is itself invisible the falcon can note its prey, and its eye is simply a self adjusting telescope. The careful dissection of the eye of the bird of prey is an absolute revelation as to creative ingenuity.—Dr. Dabbs in Fry's London Magazine.

Dean Swift's Retort.

A young advocate said to Dean Swift, "Supposing, doctor, that the parsons and the devil should litigate a cause, which party would you think would gain it?" "The devil, no doubt," was the dean's reply, "as he would have all the lawyers on his side."

A Novel Cushion.

A woman who can cleverly utilize odds and ends that most of us would throw away has found a fascinating use for small embroidered tea cloths that are too small for a card table and too big for a centerpiece. She turns them into sofa pillows that are striking in their novelty.

If the cloth has a deep embroidered border the center of the linen is cut away and the border appliqued to a cover of colored art linen, giving it an air of handsome hand embroidery.

Wistaria on Hats.

Among the prettiest of the artificial blossoms is wistaria. In its delicate lavender and white tints it is particularly lovely and springlike. Its graceful, slender clusters of bloom with glossy green leaves lend themselves admirably for trimming the new hats.

One wide brimmed hat of fine wistaria straw had a flat bow front and back of wide velvet ribbon in lavender and masses of wistaria blossoms and foliage heaped on the wide brim.

The area of the earth is 193,712,000 square miles, of which only 55,000,000 are land. The average altitude of all the land above sea level is 2,111 feet; hence, if all the land above sea level—25,000,000 cubic miles—was spread uniformly over the globe, it would form a shell 660 feet thick.

What we eat is [illegible] but the fashionable thing is to be slim, so to be fashionable is to be slim.

Therefore women who are not thin are keeping up all kinds of methods to make them so.

Live on noodles is the cry. Consequently this diet is strictly kept by women who are willing to sacrifice anything to be thin.

The latest remedy, however, is to drink camomile tea without sugar an hour after eating.

This is said to cure the most rebellious case and turn one of barrel shaped proportions into sylphlike lines.

NO MORE FREE LUNCHES

Bill Passed Which Does Away With Lunch Counters in Saloons

Free lunches in saloons are doomed. The house, just before adjournment, passed the Sen. Mackay bill, forbidding under a penalty of $10 or 90 days, the serving of anything eatable in a barroom, except crackers and pretzels. The senate passed the bill several weeks ago. The house, in a spirit of fun, voted to give the bill immediate effect, but it really will not become a law for 90 days.

DIRT ROADS ADVOCATE

Farmer Shows They May Be Had at Small Cost.

HUNDRED DOLLARS PER MILE

Earth Highways, Scientifically Built and Regularly Maintained, Are Desirable, Says P. J. Jewett, Where Cost of Rock Roads Is Too Heavy.

P. J. Jewett, a farmer near Butler Mo., has written to the Kansas City Star his follows on the subject of good roads:

I have been reading with interest the various letters and editorials in the Star on the subject of good roads, as I read with interest anything on this subject anywhere. Although a farmer, I am also a "good roads" man.

I am pleased to see the interest shown, and, while I don't want a "knock," I am afraid the cause is being injured by its friends who write it that they seem to think no road a good one unless it is made of rock at a cost of $3,000 to $5,000 a mile.

I will state as briefly as I can how the subject looks to me, and I believe I will voice the opinion of 75 per cent of the farmers in the corn belt.

It is evident that if roads are made in the country the people who live there (farmers) must either do the work or pay for it. Individually I have little interest in roads other than those in my immediate neighborhood and those leading to my market. In twenty-five years I have not driven so far that I could not get back the same day. If I have to make a trip of any considerable distance I take a train. I am not yet able to keep a motor car for pleasure and am not willing to make roads for those who are.

I live in an average township in western Missouri that has sixty miles of road. Our assessed valuation is $350,000. To make rock roads at the lowest estimated price per mile, $5,000, would cost $180,000, or more than half the value of all the property in the township. To make one mile at $3,000 would require a tax of 85 cents on $100. A rock road is never the best road. If it was we would not avoid it as we always do, when the ground is dry and speed rings would be made that way. It is not permanent, and the cost of maintaining six miles would be more than we now put on sixty.

I know that the idea is to improve the most important roads first and the others later, but the one who lives a mile from the improved road can take no more than he can pull over the unimproved one.

I note the argument that I can take larger loads, make better time, get better prices, all of which I admit, but my present income would have to be increased very much to enable me to stand this cost. I also note that good roads will enable me to sell my farm for a greater price. Suppose I don't want to sell. We are not all speculators. Would an acre produce more if its price was $100 than it would if it was $50? Without doubt I would pay twice as much tax. If I want to sell it's different, though much like life insurance—a game you have to die to beat.

Do you see why farmers promptly vote down anything along this line? In Missouri the farmers killed the two cent state road tax, that was really in their favor, because they thought it was to build a state road, in which they had no interest.

Don't think we are "mossbacks." We want good roads and appreciate their value, but if we must make them we insist that they be of a kind that we can afford and that will suit our needs.

Why not try good dirt roads? With a road drag, or set a few miles, say 10 miles or more in the townships, where travel converges, a good dirt road properly maintained would be the very best possible eight months in the year, a good one ten and possibly the other two. I believe that a mile would make good dirt roads in our township, and with $200 more we could grade down the hills, grade up the low places, tile out the wet ones, properly grade and ditch them and put in concrete culverts where bridges were not required—in fact, make a modern rock road without the rock.

As to maintenance, a mile of thirty feet road can be dragged once for 50 cents. An average of ten times will be ample. But let's say fifteen, and we have a cost of $7.50. A grader should be run over the road once a year to open ditches and maintain proper shape. Two horse graders are now made that will do this work at $2.50 a mile; plowing furrow in ditches, 50 cents. To sum up, then, we have this result:

COST PER MILE.

Construction	$300.00
MAINTENANCE ONE YEAR.
Dragging	$7.50
Grading	2.50
Plowing	.50— 10.50

A permanently good road, getting better every year, as all dragged roads do.

Looks good, doesn't it? Best of all is it's true. I have kept a mile of average road for the last six years in such condition that an ordinary good team could draw a load over it any day in that time, and the whole cost of construction and maintenance for the whole time is less than $100. Give us road laws based on common sense construction that will provide for constant maintenance and we can have good roads. Missouri has a very good one in the "special road district" act that will apply if we can get rid of the idea that the only good road is a rock road.

THE SHEPHERD.

A well bred sire will often add two or three pounds in weight of flesh or fleece over a poor one.

Protection For Lambs.

Molasses barrels or other large barrels, with one end knocked out, placed about the field and open to a warm quarter afford capital protection for lambs from cold winds. These barrels can easily be turned daily against the wind, and lambs will make extensive use of them. Warmth to a young animal is equal to so much good food.

Condition Powders For Sheep.

I keep a box fastened about two feet from the floor, under cover, always filled with salt, ashes and sulphur, two parts salt, one of ashes and one of sulphur, says a breeder. I have never needed any other condition powders. Sheep cared for in this way, if of a good breed, will be healthy and rugged, will own their lambs and have plenty of milk to raise them. I consider them one of the best paying branches of stock husbandry.

Dipping Improves the Wool.

Sheep thrive much better when their skins are clean, and it has been clearly proved that a good dip increases the quantity and improves the quality of the wool. It is absolutely impossible for lambs infested with ticks or any other parasites to thrive properly owing to the constant irritation set up.

An occasional feed of sliced raw potatoes substituted for the grain ration of colts will prove beneficial. Those that are not inclined to eat them can soon be taught to do so by cutting them very fine and mixing them with the grain ration. Potatoes are cooling and tend to prevent constipation. The latter must be guarded against when dry hay is fed. A bran mash once or twice a week into which a great spoonful of linseed meal has been stirred is an excellent laxative.

Clink of the Clogs In Japan.

One of the odd things which strike one in Japan is the footfall, so different from the sound made by shoe leather, filling the cars in, say, a crowded station in Tokyo, with its European booking trains, platforms, ticket offices, bookstalls and other familiar objects! The musical clicking noise of the wooden sandals or clogs, which are worn out of doors by all classes of Japanese and which are raised above the ground at varying heights, according to the state of the roads, is one of the most characteristic bits of detail of the country, and any picture afterward recalled to the mind has this clinkety-clink, clinkety-clink, as a running accompaniment.—London Queen.

Don't fail to call on the second-hand store while in Charlevoix.

Parsing the Word "That."

"One of the chief amusements of teaching grammar to my freshman class," said a local high school instructor, to a Louisville Courier-Journal writer, "is to see their struggle to parse the famous 'that' construction. It is possible, you know, to form a sentence which contains five consecutive 'thats.' For instance, 'He said that that that that that man referred to is an adjective.' It takes some pretty clear thinking on the part of my youngsters to solve the problem and parse each word, but usually some of them do it. The first that is a conjunction, the second is an adjective, the third is a noun, the fourth a conjunction and the fifth an adjective. Is it perfectly plain to you?"

A Correction.

A tired traveler in a small hotel was awakened in the morning by heavy pounding on his door and the voice of the old man night clerk saying: "Five o'clock! Better get up, or you'll miss your train."

The traveler didn't intend to catch a morning train and hadn't given any instructions that he should be called at the unearthly hour of 5 o'clock, so he paid no attention to the old man's early morning greeting and was asleep again almost immediately.

In about fifteen minutes he was again awakened by the pounding on his door and heard the voice of the old man saying apologetically: "Don't get up. I rapped on the wrong door."—Lippincott's.

Was the Key Word of Meeting of Pomona Grange

ELOQUENT ADDRESS BY JOHN KETCHAM

On Rural Progress in Business, Organization and Edocation

Maple Grove Banner Grange—Will Entertain Next Meeting—Grauges all in Thriving Condition.

Charlevoix Pomona grange met with Marion Center grange Thursday. Although it was a very busy season of the year, a large crowd was in attendance, representatives being present from eight of the fifteen granges of the county.

The meeting was called to order by Worthy Master Ward at 11:30. After disposing of routine business a recess for dinner was given. Everybody filled up so well that an hour or so was spent in visiting, after which the program work was taken up. Worthy Lecturer William Withers, of Marion Center, gave the patrons a hearty address of welcome which was responded to by Worthy Secretary Newville, of Pomona.

After the announcement of committees the reports of subordinate granges were read, all granges but one reporting themselves in a thriving condition.

Brother John C. Ketcham, of Hastings, was then introduced as the speaker of the afternoon and right well did he maintain his reputation as the best speaker on the list of state speakers. Bro. Ketcham first compared the progressive spirit of the residents of northern Michigan with the so-called conservatism of his section of the state such progressiveness being shown in the fine public buildings such as school houses and grange halls.

He then announced the main subject of his address as Rural Progress, which he sub-divided into three heads, Business Conditions, Organization and Education. Mr. Ketcham called attention to the question of transportation, good roads being one of the most essential features. He advised patrons to watch railway legislation and not let the appeals to sympathy being made by corporations cause a relaxation of their vigilance.

He also advocated the establishment of the parcel post and postal savings bank giving instances in his experience as post master of his city in support of his position.

Asking up the second sub-head, Organization, Brother Ketcham showed how the bringing together of dwellers in our rural communities at subordinate and Pomona grange meetings, the getting acquainted with each other; the finding out of what good fellows our neighbors really were—was an immense step in rural progress.

In education, Mr. Ketcham, who is one of the foremost educators in Michigan, said that a revolution was taking place in educational matters—that the people would no longer continue a scheme of education, which was designed to fit boys for three professions, law, medicine and the pulpit and girls all to be gentlewomen, that with one sixteenth of the boys becoming farmers and a large percentage mechanics and business men, they should be taught along these lines from the beginning—as they will be—and the girls should be taught domestic science.

"What the Coming of the State Grange to Traverse City Means to Charlevoix County" was the subject assigned to W. J. Smith, of Maple Grove grange. Brother Smith explained in a clear convincing manner, the great advantage which it will be to the order to have the members go to Traverse City and receive the inspiration of the state meeting, and the immense value which it would be to the entire county in the advertising received and the showing to the thousand of visitors the splendid opportunity presented to settlers by our county.

Brother Knudsen, of Ironton explained what the state grange meeting was to him last year and how he would surely go this year.

Worthy Master Ward explained what the plans were for taking a special train to Traverse City and how each grange would be expected to contribute their quota of the five hundred.

A committee consisting of D. S. Payton, Martin Rhuling, H. L. Olney, John A. Newville and E. E. Strond was appointed as advertising committee for Charlevoix county at the Traverse City meeting.

After supper, the committee of Good of the Order, recommended, the grange concurring, that each district hold meetings before the next Pomona to boom the Traverse City project.

The third degree was exemplified by the South Arm Grange degree team. Needless to say it was a revelation of the possibilities of grange ritualistic work.

The degree of Pomona was conferred in full ritualistic form by a picked team from Marion Center grange on a class of thirty-one, which marks an epoch in the history of Charlevoix granges, as well as the granges of Michigan. During the program musical selections were given by Brothers S. A. Martin and Walter Black and a recitation by Sister Paquette of Marion Center grange.

The next meeting will be held with Maple Grove grange, which was declared to be the banner grange of the county, sometime in August.

FOUNDER OF BOY CITY

Work of Judge Willis Brown in Salt Lake City

Where he was the First Judge of the Juvenile Court of which Law he was the Author

Each week the far reaching possibilities of Boy City is becoming more and more apparent to our citizens not only as a big thing for Charlevoix, but in the grand work Judge Brown is doing and has done for boys.

How Judge Brown and his work was regarded in Utah where he began his work is best told in the following extract from the Salt Lake Daily Herald;

The history of Judge Willis Brown's work in the State of Utah and the testimony to his marvelous genius in devising the Juvenile Court laws, establishing the Court, inaugurating these new institutions and conducting the court during the first years of its life until it became a permanent and well understood institution covering the entire state, and making Utah known as having the highest type of juvenile jurisprudence, has brought this young man the love and confidence of the best in the community in which he has lived and strived and carved out his conceptions of a jurisprudence and of activities which prevent rather than punish and which exemplify love rather than justice.

When Judge Brown came here, children were being arrainged for petty offences in the same dock with hardened criminals. There was a cell in the filthy city jail marked "for juveniles." Boys and girls were sent indiscriminately to the reform school and branded for life as unfit for good association when they were not essentially wicked or vicious; the per cent of the saved was infinitesimal, the permanently damned was awful. This was the situation when Judge Brown came and began his talks to the boys, and it takes no long memory to recall how the boys rallied to his support, nor does it take any acute observation to discover that the cigaret evil has been almost entirely abolished among the boys of the community. There have been no more cases where boys have been imprisoned with hardened criminals. The man who used to sell cigarets or liquor to boys has found it unprofitable as well as dangerous; instead of regarding the law and courts with terror the wayward youngsters have learned to know the Judge as a refuge when they are tempted, a friend when they are in trouble, and to recognize their own obligation to observe the law, and enforce it. Waiving any question of moral values, the Juvenile Court has been the best investment the city or State has ever made, and the returns are due to the Judge who has managed it. Every principal in the public schools has declared the value of the court under Judge Brown's administration. Every man, woman and child who has had occasion to see the workings of the court, knows it is a powerful agency for the moral uplift of childhood of the whole community.

NEW TUITION LAW

Provides for the Sending of Roral Pupils to High Schools

Notice Must be Given to School Boards by June 27.

One of the most important bills passed by the legislature in years, is the Tuttle bill which provides for the payment by the district of tuition of graduates of eighth grades of district schools, who may want to attend a high school. Thus many a pupil of humble means will be assisted in getting a better education without which the young men and women of today are badly handicapped in the competition of life. This is one of the broadest and most important advances for years.

As the new constitution provides that bills passed do not become laws until 90 days after the session of the legislature closes, unless otherwise specified, it will not be possible according to the present state of the bill to take advantage of the proposition till next year. It is possible, however, that provision may be made arranging the law so that pupils who make application for tuition in June may enter school next fall. The bill will be of the greatest benefit to those aspirants for an education, who cannot afford to do so because they lack the means and many of them will surely take advantage of the privilege.

The bill follows:

The People of the state of Michigan enact:

Section 1. The board of education of any school district which does not maintain a high school shall have authority and is hereby required to vote a tax sufficient to pay the tuition to one of the three nearest high schools of any children residents of said district who have completed the studies of the eight grades, not exceeding in amount twenty-five dollars per pupil and may vote a tax to pay the transportation during school days of such children, such expense and tuition to be paid by the treasurer of the district in which the pupil resides to the treasurer of district where the high school attended is located: Provided, that parents of such children shall give written notice to the board of education on or before the fourth Monday of June that they are parents or legal guardians of such children and that such children desire to attend some certain one of the three nearest high schools during the ensuing year. Upon receiving written notice of children eligible to attend high schools the board of education shall vote a tax sufficient to cover the necessary expense for tuition as hereio provided, and any may vote a tax sufficient to cover the necessary expense for daily transportion of: Provided further, that any money in the treasury of said district belonging to the primary fund may be used in defraying such expenses and tuition in lieu of a tax thereof.

Section 2. The tax provided for in section 1 of this act shall be reported to the clerk of the township in which such district is located and shall be spread upon the tax roll of such township in the same manner and at the same time as other school taxes.

LARGEST CLASS IN ITS HISTORY

Gradoated From County Normal This Year

COMMENCEMENT WAS HELD FRIDAY

Members of the Class Made Up Class Day Program

Commencement Address by Hon. F. L. Keeler on How to Succeed an Inspiring One.

The Class Day program of the County Normal which was given Friday, June 4, was of special interest. The M. E. church had been decorated with the class colors, green and gold, and the church was fragrant with apple blossoms which banked the altar rail. There were fourteen graduates, making the largest class in the history of the Normal school thus far. Each member of the class had some part in the program and the program as a whole showed the various lines of work of the school.

The "President's Message" a brief introductory speech by the president of the class, Mildred Drescher, was clearly given. She spoke of the significance of the numbers of the program, and their relation to the academic and professional training of the Normal course. The theme "Literature in Connection with Nature Study" by Ruth Bowdish was an interesting paper. The co-relation between literature and nature study was further shown by a selection from "The Vision of Sir Launfal" by Jessie Metz and the "Story of Persephone" by Cecile Barkley.

All of the members of the class had written themes on various educational topics. Brief reviews of two of these themes were given. "School Life and Its Relation to Things Outside" was discussed by Florence Sheldon and Kathryn LaPeer spoke on "Sense Training." The teaching of a class in first grade reading was greatly enjoyed, Maud Cross, who had charge of the class, seemed perfectly at ease as if she were in her own school room with her pupils. The musical numbers of the program, the piano solo, by Clare Finucan, the duet by Jessie Durance and Alma Brodie, the song by the children of the Training Room, and the chorus by the Normal Class were all very pleasing. The song by the Training Room children deserves special mention since it was given under the direction of one of the Normal girls, Hazel Holliday, and indicates something of the work of the Normal students in their practice teaching. The short discussion of the Payne Tariff Bill by Edith Brodie was given to illustrate the use of current events in connection with the study of civics. The co-relation of literature with geography and history was shown by the two numbers bearing on the Battle of Bunker Hill. The description by Margaret Ryan of the scene of the battle was given with great spirit, while "Grandmother's Story of Bunker Hill" was charmingly told by Pearl Hurst.

Commencement exercises were held Friday evening at the same place. After a march was played by Miss Munyon, Harker Kirby sang and the speaker of the evening, Hon. F. L. Keeler, was introduced by Superintendent Woodley, who said Mr. Keeler was not only the choice of the class but of the faculty as well.

Mr. Keeler took as his subject, "How to Succeed." He first asked the question, what is success? Work, the great secret of success; quoted the early life of Booker T. Washington in his struggle to obtain an education and what he has made of himself. Success is obtained by devotion to one's purpose.

"What is failure? Lack of knowledge. Success is knowing how, guided by the principles of honesty and the square deal and thoroughness of purpose. The force of sympathy should be shown in all our dealings with people. Mingle with your children. Be a companion to them. Never make them a promise and then forget it.

After a violin solo by George Johnston, the diplomas were presented by Commissioner of Schools Milford, who impressed upon the class that commencement was the beginning of success or failure, not the end of a hard year's work. Another class was added to Charlevoix county's well trained teachers.

DEATH OF ROLAND SRIGLEY

Had Only Lived in This County Since March

Leaves a Wife and Eight Children—Funeral Held Sunday

Roland Srigley of Hayes died at his home in that township, Friday morning, June 4, aged seventy-two years.

Mr. Srigley was born in Canada, January 7, 1837, and came to Michigan in 1850, settling in Similac county, afterward moving to Huron county where he lived for over twenty years, coming to this county last March moving on the farm of his son Will, in Hayes township, where he died. During his residence in our county Mr. Srigley has been ill nearly all the time, but those who had become acquainted with him had learned to appreciate his many sterling qualities.

February 1, 1862, he was married to Elizabeth Badgro, who still survives, as well as his eight children, Mrs. Ernest Wendt of Ashland, Wisconsin, Mrs. Chris Schiller and C. B. and H. F. Srigley of Levering, Mrs. Charlie Smith of Ubly, R. J. Srigley of Grand Marais, D. W. Srigley of Hayes and W. W. Srigley of this city.

The funeral was held at the house Sunday, Rev. R. A. Wright officiating. Several members of the I. O. O. F., of which his sons in this vicinity are members, attending. Burial at Brookside.

A NEW INDUSTRY

Block Brothers are Manofacturing Cheese

Product is of a High Class—Importance of Industry

The X L Produce Company under the new management of Block Bros. are rapidly increasing their business. Their latest enterprise is the putting in of machinery for manufacturing cheese, both Young America full cream in five and ten pound cheeses and first class cottage cheese in one pound packages.

The first batch of cheese was turned out May 26, James Block making the first cheese. Block Bros. are old hands at the business of making cheese and the high quality of the product turned out is an assurance of success in the new field of industry.

The fostering of dairy interests in this section is one that should appeal to everyone, for where the dairy interests are advanced the value of land cannot help but be increased, as it brings back on the land as much, or more, than is taken away, besides making a regular source of income to the farmer.

We urge all to see and talk with Block Bros.

NORTH MICHIGAN TRACK MEET

Charlevoix Boys End Contest far in Lead

TAKING FIRST PLACE IN TEN EVENTS

Small Makes Highest Score of Any Contestant

Boyne City Winner of Ball Game with Petoskey by 11 to 7 Charlevoix Score 73 1-4.

In the Northern Michigan track meet held at Petoskey Saturday, the Charlevoix boys again demonstrated, that in athletics, Charlevoix knows no superior, winning the meet by a total score of 73¼ points. Small taking 17, the highest number scored by any contestant. The total score was Charlevoix 73¼; Petoskey, 28½; Pellston, 14. East Jordan, 11½; Harbor Springs, 6.

The ball game between Boyne City and Petoskey was won by the former by a score of 11 to 7.

The following are the winners of the events:

Shot Put—Moody, Pellston, 38 feet, 1½ inches; Small, Charlevoix; Taylor, East Jordan.

Two Mile Run—Nettleton, Charlevoix, 12 minutes, 31 seconds; Carey, Harbor Springs; Pearl, Harbor Springs.

Discus Throw—Taylor, East Jordan, 71 feet 1 inches; Kirby, Petoskey; Harsig, Charlevoix.

High Hurdles—Small, Charlevoix 19 seconds; Crane, Charlevoix; Beatty, Petoskey.

Broad Jump—Small, Charlevoix, 18 feet, 3 inches; Emory, Charlevoix (second on toss up); Beatty, Petoskey.

Relay Race—Charlevoix Emory, Mayne—Hampton and Bridge woo, Petoskey, Warren, Fallass, Beatty, Meyers, second place.

A good crowd witnessed the various events and were highly enthusiastic, to the point of hat throwing, at the close margins in some of the events. The judges were all satisfactory in their decisions, that being one matter that was especially pleasing to the spectators. During the whole day's program there was not one instance of beefing or wrangling so commonly found, which is assuredly appreciated by all interested in athletics. Prof. H M. Elliott, of Petoskey; Prof. Munson of Harbor Springs, Mr. Campbell of Charlevoix, Mr. DeVoe of Charlevoix and Mr. Butler of Boyne City were the judges. Clarence Christopher officiated as referee and starter and Phillip Braun as clerk of course.

INCREASING BUSINESS

Forces W. F. Johnson to Put in New Machinery.

Johnson, the ice cream man, finds himself forced to increase the capacity of his factory by his rapidly increasing business and he is putting in a new forty-five quart copper can freezer, which he will use in addition to his present freezers, which he will keep busy at short order work.

Mr. Johnson has been enabled to build up this growing business by his policy of always putting out the best cream possible to produce and we rejoice in his well earned success.

CORRESPONDENCE

FROM CENTRAL LAKE.

O. R. Morse is contracting beans at Fremont.

Plenty of rain and green things are growing.

Roy Walbright officiated at the mill during the sickness of his father.

E. B. Gill has contracted nearly all his beans, squash and pumpkin and sweet corn and is getting ready for the cherry harvest which promises to be a big one.

Miss Lida Blakely returned home from Toledo, Ohio, last Saturday where she had been stopping with her aunt and uncle, William Hopkins and wife, during the winter and spring.

S. B. Anway and wife, Mrs. Savage and Mrs. Sanford drove to Bellaire last week and attended the Intermediate Fruit Grower's convention held at the home of H. M. Henstreet. They report a very successful meeting. Mr. Henstreet has invited the association to meet with him again next fall, when he will serve refreshments of peaches and cream from his own farm.

Decoration day services were observed here Monday afternoon, Atty. Meggison was on the program as speaker of the day. The only thing to mar the observance of the day was a ball game called for the afternoon. Decoration day services were observed as usual at the Bay View school house five miles northwest of town. Rev. Knight, of Eastport, gave the address and a choir composed of the following singers rendered several mixed chorus and quartettes. Mesdames Sanford, Savage, Chamberlain and Miss Arnold with Miss Guyer as organist. Messrs. Chamberlain, Lathrop, Dawson and Morse. Graves were decorated at the Bay View cemetery half mile west of the school house.

Deafness Cannot be Cured.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give one hundred dollars for any case of deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars free. F. J. CHENEY & Co., Toledo, O. Sold by druggists, 75c.

WINTER WOOD.

It Makes the Best and Most Lasting Kind of Timber.

It has long been known that winter was the best time of the year for cutting down trees for their timber, but until the American bureau of forestry published the results of some experiments no one was sure why. The bureau of forestry selected four pine trees of the same age and of equal vigor, growing in the same soil, and felled them, the first at the end of December, the second at the end of January, the third at the end of February and the fourth at the end of March. They were hewn into logs of the same size and dried at the same place. Then the logs were tested.

The December log resisted a flexile strain twice as strong as that which the March log resisted. It furnished piles which were still perfect and undecayed sixteen years later, while the piles made from the March log had rotted within three or four years.

Wood that is felled in December is less porous than that cut at other times. It has been proved that oak felled in the spring allowed water to percolate through it in from two to three hours, while similar wood cut in December was seemingly impermeable.

There is a very simple method of asthree hours, while similar wood cut in winter or in spring. The former contains finery particles, which turn blue when tincture of iodine is poured upon them. The latter preserves its natural tint or merely becomes a little darker at the contact of iodine.—New York World.

A Move For Good Roads.

Nearly 1,000,000 voters of Pennsylvania have signed petitions asking the state legislature to start the movement which in 1913 will give a bond issue of $50,000,000 for building good roads. The sum of $5,000,000 will be asked for to begin immediate work.

OFFICE A, SMITH BLOCK

The Lawyer Used It For More Than His Legal Business.

By LUCY POOLE.

[Copyright, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.]

It had always been reported around town that C. R. Taylor was a wealthy man. When he appeared at the general meeting place, Hinkham's grocery, all the men would shift their wads and straighten their hats out of deference as he seated himself on the best cracker barrel by the stove and planted his feet on the warmest spot.

But the swift, horrible accident had silenced the jovial Croesus, and his estate had been revealed to the public's horrified gaze as absolutely worthless.

Mrs. Taylor had been prostrated completely. Janet had struggled as she could, but after all the funeral expenses had been paid her little store of banknotes had dwindled away to a pathetic few.

"Now, Burt," she explained severely to her manly little friend, lawyer and devoted lover, "it is a case of sheer necessity, you see. We will only have $10 a month from the farm, and that won't even pay mother's doctor bills."

"Janet," began the young man, his voice husky with the emotion he tried to suppress—"Janet, I'm in good business now, and your father had given me his consent, so why won't you let me help you in this time of trouble? You know I"—

"Yes, I know, Burt," answered the girl gently, "but it is impossible. Now, my plan is this: At college I took all the four prizes for the best essays and had good success with the college weekly and annual."

Burt could hardly hide a smile. This young slip of womanhood talking of $30 a month paid for her literary work! Poor child, she did not realize that college weeklies and city daily papers differ strikingly in their demands.

But one simply could not argue with Janet. Her radiant beauty was her strongest weapon, and Burt left her in high spirits.

"Burt, I shall depend on you for the addresses of all the best papers and magazines in the city," she called to him as he strode down the walk. "And don't forget to read every line I publish," came indistinctly to his ears as he turned the corner to the station.

"NEVER LET ANYTHING SEPARATE YOU AND BURT."

Burton Harold was tied to his office day and night for the next three weeks, scarcely having time to snatch a bit to eat or an hour's rest. Yet the dainty, dark beauty of Janet's charming face floated tantalizingly before the dusty lawbooks or the tiresome documents.

He had not heard a word from her since he had mailed the addresses, and he wondered whether he could have been mistaken and Janet's work was actually making good. On the Saturday of a third week he locked the door of Office A, Smith block, and took the train down to the village to gladden his mother's heart by sight of himself and his eyes by a sight of Janet.

He found the girl pale and quiet, with very little to say. It was not until the end of the call that he had the courage to ask about her literary work. At his first word the unnatural calm gave way and she cried like a child.

"It's no use, Burt," she sobbed. "I've tried and tried, but everything comes back with a polite 'Of no use,' and I know it is just because they don't read my work."

Burt was sorely tempted. Had he followed his own inclination he would have gathered the girl into his strong arms and bidden the senseless editors go wherever they pleased. But this was out of the question. "I'll tell you, Janet," he said soothingly—"give me your work and I'll take it back with me tomorrow and see what I can do."

And so the matter rested, and Burton returned to his office with a roll of classical raptures, such as "The Lushy Marsh Where the Cows Stood Knee Deep In Cowslips" and other totally unsalable works of his ambitious sweet heart.

He took up another story and read through one long outburst over "a full blown apple orchard, where the busy bee doth ply his trade." "Awful, awful!" he said to himself. "But what can you expect from a college girl? Why, I can't even doctor these lists of adjectives up. They are only fit for the wastebasket."

The next day brought a brief letter to Janet:

Dear Janney—Inclosed will find a check for $10. I sold your "Apple Orchard In Full Bloom." Address your work now to Office A, Smith block. It's an agency for short stories, and they will take anything you will send them. Don't know what magazines they use, but their work goes all over the country. Congratulations on your great luck. As ever,

BURT.

The next time Burton visited his mother in the village it was several months after the above letter.

Janet was radiant, glowing and, above all, tender. She confided to him that she received from $5 to $10 for every article and often $25 for a story and that she made as high as $40 a month. Burt only smiled and listened.

Everything was rose colored now and turned to a deeper hue when Janet whispered at the gate, "You can ask me anything you please now, Burt, dear." And he rode back to the city, his check tingling under the rosy seal she had set there as a safeguard against all danger.

It was near spring when Mrs. Harold was suddenly taken ill. In her condition she needed loving care, so Janet went down to stay with the gentle old lady, who, she thought, would not live to see the little wedding planned for June.

Burton came home on Saturday, and the feeble old lady watched the couple with tear dimmed eyes and many softly breathed prayers. Toward night her breathing grew more and more labored, and the end was not far away.

"Janet, dear," she whispered painfully—"Janet, promise me now, dear, that you will never let anything separate you and Burt."

The girl kissed her wonderingly and promised softly.

"Doctor," went on the trembling, tired voice, "how much longer have I here with my children?"

"I cannot tell, my dear madam," answered the ancient doctor, with tears in his eyes. "Perhaps a few hours."

"Burton, my darling boy," went on the loving tones, "lean over me, my son. You and Janet must be married now. I cannot go peacefully until I know my boy has a comforter. Here comes Dr. Method, and he will marry you now if"— And the voice trailed off into silence.

Without waiting to consult Janet, Burton stepped to her side, and in a few moments the service was over and the dying woman had placed her trembling hands on their bowed heads and passed peacefully to the land where sorrow is never known.

A month or so after his mother's death Burton decided to move his wife to the city, where he could be at home every night. So Janet went to the little home to pack up the dead mother's boxes. It was a sad task, and Janet's eyes overflowed many a time, for she had loved the dear old lady as a daughter.

In going through the ancient desk she found a large package marked in the delicate old fashioned hand, "For my son Burton, to be opened after his marriage with Janet." Janet fingered it curiously, but slipped it into her bag unopened. When in their cozy library that night she brought it to her husband, saying:

"Burt, dear, do open this. I am so curious."

A queer smile passed over her husband's face as he broke the string and out rolled all the well remembered manuscripts of Janet's, "The Apple Orchard In Full Bloom" and others.

"Burton!" she cried in surprise. "Why, Burton, how on earth did your mother ever get these?"

"My dear little wife," he answered, holding her closely in his arms, "my office is office A, Smith block, and mother and I were the short story company that published all your work."

Went Around the Spot.

Before Bismarck reconstructed the map of Europe and made a united Germany a dozen little principalities used to annoy travelers by stopping them at their frontiers until they had satisfied the custom house demands. A Yankee once had his carriage stopped at the frontier of a petty prince's country. The Herr Ober (controleur at the custom house) came forward and, much to his indignation, was received in a nonchalant way. The Yankee was ungentlemanly enough not to get out of his carriage or even to take off his hat. The Herr Ober sharply demanded the key of the tourist's trunks, which his subordinate began handling roughly.

"Here! Hands off!" shouted the Yankee. "I didn't come from the United States of America to be controlled by you. Put those trunks back. I'll not go through you at all. I'll turn back. I'm in no hurry and don't care for losing a day. You're no country! You're only a spot. I'll go around you!" And he did.—London King.

More In the Family.

Catherine's maternal grandmother died suddenly, and she found it hard from the three-year-old point of view to understand the new order of things.

A few days after the funeral she was sent to visit an old family friend that her mother might enjoy a day of uninterrupted quiet. Very seriously she related how they had put her grandma in a deep black hole and nobody could see her any more.

Her hostess was profuse in her expressions of sympathy and tried to impress the little one that she, too, would miss her grandmother very much.

"Oh, don't let it worry you," she exclaimed; "I've got another one."—New York Times.

THE CAPTAIN OF the KANSAS

By LOUIS TRACY,

Author of "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," Etc.

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY EDWARD J. CLODE

CHAPTER IX—Continued.

"It is as much as a crank can manage in fine weather to reach the island out there, which they call Seal Island," he cried, pointing toward the locality of White Horse Island. "Even the Indians were astonished to see so big a ship anchored here safely. They have watched plenty of wrecks outside, and hardly anything comes ashore. At any rate, they are quite sure you cannot get back."

It would be idle to deny that the Spaniard's words sent a chill of apprehension down the spines of some of those present, but the captain said calmly:

"Where a ship is concerned, if she can enter on the flood she can go out on the ebb. How came you to escape tonight?"

Tears stood again in Suarez's eyes as he replied:

"When I heard their plan I imagined they would be driven off, provided a watch were kept. I resolved to risk all in the attempt to reach the company of civilized men once more. I do not care what the outcome may be. If I can help you to overcome them, I am ready to do so; if not, I will die by your side. Tonight I followed in a canoe unseen. When I heard the shooting I leaped overboard and swam to the ship. It was lucky for me some one seized the canoe which I found there. The men in her had to swim to other canoes, and two were wounded. I heard them say. This caused some confusion, and I had something to grasp when I reached the ship; otherwise I must have been drowned, as the water was very cold."

"Can you speak the Mackinof language?"

"Is that what you call them? Their own name for the tribe is the 'Feathered People,' because all their chief men and heads of families wear these things," and he touched his headdress. "Yes, I know nearly all their words. They don't use a great many. One word may have several meanings, according to the pitch of the voice."

Suddenly his voice failed him. Though the words came fluently, his long disused vocal chords were unequal to the strain of measured speech. He asked hoarsely for some hot water. When Courtenay next came across him in the saloon he was asleep and changed so greatly by the removal of pigments from his face that it was difficult to regard him as the same being.

His story was unquestionably true. Tollemache, who had fought an offshoot tribe of these same Indians; Christobal, who vouched for the Argentine accent, and Elsie, who seemed to have read such rare books of travel as dealt with that little known part of the world, bore out the reasonableness of his statements. The only individual on board who regarded him with suspicion was Joey, and even Joey was satisfied when Suarez had washed himself.

It was daylight again, a dawn of dense mist, without wind or hail, ere any member of the ship's company thought of sleep. Then Elsie went to her cabin and dreamed of a river of molten gold, down which she was compelled to sail in a cockleshell boat, while fantastic monsters swam around and eyed her suspiciously.

When at last she awoke after a few hours of less exciting slumber she came out on deck to find the sun shining on a fairyland of green and blue and diamond white, with gaunt gray rocks and groves of copper beeches to frame the picture. There was no pillar of smoke on the lower hills to bear silent testimony to the presence of the Indians, but the canoe lying alongside told her that the previous night's events were no part of her dreams, and a man whom she did not recognize—a man with closely cropped gray hair and a deeply lined, weather tanned face from which a pair of sunken, flashing eyes looked kindly at her—said in Spanish:

"Good morning, senorita. I hope I did not startle you when I came aboard. And I said things I should not have said in the presence of a lady. But, believe me, senorita, I was drunk with delight."

CHAPTER X.

ELSIE had slept long and soundly. She found herself in a new world of sunshine and calm. Her brain had been cleared, restored to the normal by refreshing sleep. With a more active perception of the curious difficulties which beset the Kansas came a feeling akin to despair. The brightness of nature served rather to convert the ship into a prison. Storm and stress, whether of the elements or of the less candid foes who lurked unseen on the neighboring shores, made the Kansas a veritable fortress, a steel refuge seemingly impregnable. But the knowledge of the vessel's helplessness and of the equally desperate hazard which beset her inmates was rendered only more poignant by the smiling aspect of land and sea.

But she was hungry, and that was a saving sign. She guessed that many of the men after mounting watch until broad daylight were asleep. Others were at work below, as was testified by a subdued sound of hammering, with the sharp clink of metal against metal. Walker was tinkering at the engines. With him in all likelihood were the captain and Tollemache. She and Suarez were the drones of the ship, and Suarez, poor fellow, had earned an idle hour or two only on account of the scrubbing he had given himself to wash away the tokens of five years of slavery.

Before going in search of the cook she walked a few steps toward the bridge. At the top of the companion she saw Joey, sitting disconsolately on his tail, a sure indication that Courtenay was occupied in depths approachable only by such lubbers as Walker the dog could not follow.

She whistled softly to her little friend, knowing that Christobal and perhaps Mr. Boyle would be on the bridge, keeping the lookout, and she was not in mood for talk at the moment. Joey sprang down the stairs barking joyously, and leaped into her outstretched arms.

He honored no other person on board except his master with such extravagant friendship, and as the girl carried him aft to the cook's galley she asked herself why the dog had taken such a liking to her.

She blushed a little as she thought:

"It may be that I resemble the lady whom Captain Courtenay is going to marry. I wonder why he did not show us her photograph that day when Isobel and I visited his cabin and looked at the pictures of his mother and sister. I should like to see her, but how can I manage it? I simply dare not tell him I read that scrap of a letter, even by chance."

The dog apparently found her an excellent substitute. He licked her ear contentedly. That tickled her, and she laughed.

"I fear you are a fickle lover, Joey," she said aloud. "But you will simply be compelled to remain constant to me while we are in this horrid place, and that may be for the remainder of our lives, dear."

Joey tried to lick her again to show that he didn't care. What could any reasonable dog want more than fine weather, enough to eat and the prospect of an occasional scrimmage?

When Elsie did ultimately climb to the chart house the fit of despondency had fled. Boyle was there, having been carried up in a deck chair early in the day. He was alone.

"Hmh!" he growled, pleasantly. "You're lookin' as bright as a new pin, Miss Maxwell. Now, if I had been among the pirates I'd have taken you with me."

"Do you mean to say that you are actually paying me compliments?" said she.

"Am I? Huh—didn't mean it. I'm an old married man. But pirates, especially Spanish ones, are supposed to be very handy with knives an' other fellows' girls."

"You see they did not consider me a prize."

"The rascals! Good job you missed that boat. Christobal has been tellin' me all about it. They've gone under."

"Do you really think so?"

"Can't see any chance for them, Miss Maxwell."

"But we are almost as badly situated here?"

"Huh—not a bit of it. Lucky chap, Courtenay. He couldn't lose a ship if he tried. She'd follow him 'cross country like that pup. Look at us; lost three, all brand new from the builders. So I'm first mate, an' first mate I'll remain till my ticket gives out."

"Why do you consider Captain Courtenay so fortunate?" asked Elsie, flushing somewhat at the gulf which lay behind the question.

"Huh!" snorted Boyle, amazed that even a slip of a girl should need informing on so obvious a fact. "Don't you call it luck to be given command of a ship like the Kansas at his age an' to get £500 an' a gold chronometer because the skipper of the Florida was too full to hold on to the bridge? You mark my words, he'll be made commodore of the fleet after he pulls the Kansas out of this mess."

"What happened to the Florida?"

"Haven't you heard that yarn? Bless my soul, she was our crack ship. She broke her shaft in a gale, an' the skipper was washed overboard—you always tell lies about leaders, you know—so A. C. just waded in an' saved the whole outfit, passengers an' all."

"But he has had reverses too. He was in the royal navy, I have been told, and he had to give it up because his people"—

"More luck. The royal navy! Huh—all gold braid an' buy your own victuals. There's no money in that game."

"Money is not everything in the world. A man's career may be more to him than the mere monetary aspect of it."

"If ever you meet my missus you'll hear the other side of the question, Miss Maxwell. S'posin' Courtenay was in the navy an' had a wife an' family to keep, could he do it on his pay? Not he. As it is, he's sure to marry a girl with a pile an' wind up a managin' owner."

"Perhaps he is engaged to some such young lady already?"

"Haven't heard so. You may be sure there's one waitin' for him somewhere, I know. There's no dodgin' luck, good or bad. I thought it was goin' to be that friend of yours, but she's off the register, poor lass. There! I didn't mean that. I'm an idiot, for sure. You see, I don't talk much, as a rule, Miss Maxwell, or I should know better than to chin-wag like a blazin'—huh, like a balddih' fool."

Elsie turned her face ashie when he mentioned Isobel. It seemed to her sensitive soul an almost unfair thing that she should be gossiping about trivialities when the girl who had commenced this unlucky voyage in such high spirits was lying beneath that grim sea behind the sullen headland. Yet she knew that Boyle meant no harm by his chatter. He was weak from his wound and perhaps a trifle light headed as the result of being brought from the stuffy saloon to the airy and sunlit chart room. So she crushed a sorrow that was marvelling and strove to put the sailor at his ease again.

"I do not find any harm in your remark," she said resolutely. "Were it possible I should have been very pleased to see Miss Baring married to a man of strong character like Captain Courtenay. By the way, who is keeping watch on deck?"

"The doctor was here with me until a few minutes ago. Then the skipper telephoned him. I guess there is some one on the lookout, for you might just cast an eye sharp astern. I'm not supposed to move yet."

He wriggled uneasily in his chair, for the spirit was willing, but Elsie made him be quiet. She rearranged his pillow and stepped on to the bridge. By walking from port to starboard and traversing the short length of the upper deck she could command a view of the bay and of most parts of the ship. She heard the dog scrambling down the companion. On reaching the after rail she saw the captain engaged in earnest, low toned conversation with Tollemache and Walker. They were standing on the main deck near the engine room door and examining something which resembled a lump of coal. She saw the engineer take three similar lumps from a pocket.

Christobal appeared, carrying a bucket of water, into which the lumps were placed by Walker, who handled them very gingerly. After a slight delay he began to crumble one in his fingers, still keeping it in the water, until finally he drew forth what Elsie recognized at once as a stick of dynamite. Though it was blackened by contact with the coal, she was certain of its real nature. She had visited a great many mines, and the officials always scared the ladies of the party by telling them what would happen if the explosives were to blow up. She had even seen dynamite placed in the sun to dry, as it is very susceptible to moisture, and she wondered, naturally enough, why such a dangerous agent should be hidden in or disguised as a piece of coal.

She thought that the men should be made aware of her presence, so she leaned over and said:

"May I ask what you four are plotting?"

They looked at her in surprise. They were so engrossed in their discovery

"In which bunker was the coal placed which we shipped at Valparaiso?"

that they had eyes for nothing else. Walker straightway plunged the sausage shaped gray stick into the water again.

"What are you doing with that dynamite?" she demanded. "Do you intend to visit Senor Suarez's mines? If so, please take me. I am very poor."

It was Courtenay who answered.

"Are you alone?" he asked.

"Mr. Boyle is in the chart house."

"I know, but is any one else up there?"

"No."

"Then we shall join you at once."

Notwithstanding the serious demeanor of the men, Elsie was far from guessing what had happened. But she was soon enlightened.

"In which bunker was the coal placed which we shipped at Valparaiso?" Courtenay asked Boyle.

"In the forrard cross bunker," was the instant answer.

"And that was the first coal used in the furnaces?"

"Yes, sir."

The captain's tone was official, exceedingly so, and the chief officer took the cue from his superior in rank.

"Did we get up steam with it?"

"There might have been a hundredweight or two lying loose in the stokehold, but for all practical purposes we have used nothing but the Valparaiso bunker since we left port."

"The rest of our coal was shipped at Coronel?"

"Yes, sir."

"You hear? It is exactly as I have told you," said Courtenay, glancing at the others. "I must explain to you, Mr. Boyle, that I wished you to state the facts in front of witnesses before I gave you my reasons for cross examining you on the matter. Mr. Walker and I have been certain all along that the furnaces were blown up wilfully. Now our suspicions are proved. This morning, after a careful scrutiny, we came across a number of lumps of coal cleverly constructed out of small pieces glued together. In the center of each lump was a stick of dynamite, protected by an asbestus wrapper. It was undoubtedly the intent of some miscreant that a number of these lumps should be fed into the furnaces. This actually occurred, as we know, but by the mercy of Providence the ship did not experience the full power of the explosion or she must have sunk like a stone."

"Huh," gruated Boyle. "Who holds the insurance?"

"The shippers of the cargo, of course—Messrs. Baring, Thompson & Miguel."

"Worth a quarter of a million sterling, ain't it?"

"Yes."

"Huh—it's a lot of money."

There was a momentary silence. Elsie's eyes grew larger, and she became rather pale. As was her habit when puzzled, she placed a finger on her lips. Christobal noted her action. Indeed, he missed few of her characteristic habits or expressions. He laughed quietly.

"I think you are quite right, Miss Maxwell," he said. "This is one of the many instances in which silence is golden."

Taken by surprise, she blushed and dropped her hand. But Courtenay said promptly:

"There are some instances in which silence may be misinterpreted. Let me state at once that the shippers of the valuable cargo on board the Kansas will suffer a serious financial reverse if the ship is lost. Two thousand tons of copper may be worth a considerable fixed sum, but the lack of the metal on the London market at the end of January will have far reaching consequences to a fight against the bull clique in Paris, and that is why Mr. Baring made this heavy shipment."

"Those consequences could be foreseen and discounted," put in Tollemache dryly.

"Exactly. But by whom—by the man who sent his only daughter as a passenger on this vessel?"

Every one scouted that notion. But Tollemache, though disavowing any thought of Mr. Baring as a party to the scheme, stuck to his guns.

"Somebody will make a pile when the Kansas is reported missing," he said.

"The insurance money will not be paid for a long time," Courtenay explained.

"No, but the copper market will rebound instantly."

MILWAUKEE BUSINESS MEN

Paid Charlevoix a Flying Visit With Special Train Tuesday.

The Milwaukee Merchant's and Manufacturer's Association's special train arrived on schedule time Tuesday. They were met at the depot by the committee from the city council and Board of Commerce and a few business men and were taken on the Str. Search Light for a trip on our three lakes, after which they assembled at the Charlevoix Theater and Mayor Wilbur welcomed them to the city in a hearty manner, the response being made by the president of the association, Mr. Moss. The octette, that accompanied the Milwaukee men entertained the crowd in a pleasing manner and the visitors left promising to come again.

On arriving at the station the visitors were put in connection by the long distance bell phone at Milwaukee and made good use of the courtesy extended them by Manager Cronter and his company.

AMERICAN FLAG

Anniversary of Its Birth Occurs Friday, June 14

Address to American Public by Warren Lee Goss.

Friday, the 14th of June, will be the one hundred thirtieth anniversary of the birth of the flag of the United States. The flag was designed for a nation of thirteen colonies, stretched like a belt along the Atlantic coast, made up of less than three millions of people without common traditions or language; drawn together only by common danger from savages within, and oppression from without, which threatened their existence and liberties. That flag now waves over a great nation, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the Lakes; from the Atlantic to beyond the Pacific Sea; and inhabited by nearly ninety millions of people, who speak a common language.

Our flag is now—in form—the oldest flag of civilized nations. The resolution by congress for the adoption of the Stars and Stripes on June the 14th, 1777, was as follows: "Resolved that the flag of the United States be thirteen stripes, alternate red and white; that the Union be thirteen stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation." The design of this flag is credited to George Washington, and in part was taken from his family coat of arms. Such is the origin of a flag dedicated to the proposition that "all men are created free and equal." Let us honor the natal day of our national flag—displaying it from our public buildings, schools, and homes in recognition of this memorable day.

The men of the Grand Army of the Republic, who preserved the nation in the greatest war of modern times and made vital the Declaration of our fathers, call upon all who live under the flag to recognize this day by patriotic observances in schools and—on the Sunday preceding—in churches. To this end we suggest that the Governor of every state by proclamation announce the day and promote its recognition; that the press scatter this call—as seeds of patriotism—broadcast over the land. Such recognition will nourish the greatness of our nation, inculcate noble citizenship, the principles of civil liberty, and be an object lesson to the new generations that have come upon the stage since the Civil War.

WARREN LEE GOSS,
National Patriotic Instructor,
Grand Army of the Republic.

LESS BEER USED

Consumption of Spirits Has Increased During Last Year.

The board of trustees of the United States brewers' association, in session at Atlantic City, New Jersey, reported that the prohibition wave had reached a climax and is now receding.

The report states that "there is a growing conviction that the professional advocates of the anti-saloon league overshot the mark and that their statements are grossly exaggerated. The political character of the agitation is apparent and in some states thoughtful people prefer to consider the drink question constructively."

The report declares that one result of the anti-saloon legislation is a decrease in beer consumption and an increase in spirits consumption. It declared that county option in Michigan and elsewhere was a failure.

William Manchester, the Michigan brewer's counsel, discussed the legal aspects of the situation, and other prominent persons spoke.

Courier liners bring results.

YOU want value for your money when you buy clothes or anything else; and that's really all you do want; if you get full value when you buy things, you ought to be satisfied.

That's one of the reasons why we like to sell Hart Schaffner & Marx clothes. There's more value for the money in them than in any other clothes we know.

It's in the all-wool fabrics, for one thing; the quality that endures with steady wear. It's in the tailoring; the clothes are put together right, with best linings and trimmings. There's value in the style, too; you'll feel better dressed in such clothes, and that means you'll be worth more to yourself.

You want such clothes as these and we have them. Suits $18 to $40

The Whole World For Good Roads.

The motor car naturally suggested the good road, and all the world has taken up the building of good roads in response to the suggestion. It is a new idea with us in California, but it is growing like the weeds by the roadside these warm, damp spring days. The single county of Los Angeles is getting busy to spend $3,500,000 in the construction of 300 miles of fine roads inside of its own limits. The state, we hope, will not lag behind in response to this twentieth century sentiment. The governor asks for an appropriation of $18,000,000 to build two trunk lines the whole length of the state, in all something like 1,000 miles. —Los Angeles Times.

Good Roads In France.

In France the highways are the chief competitors of the railroads. The farreaching and splendidly maintained road system has distinctly favored the small landed proprietors, and in their prosperity and their ensuing distribution of wealth lies the key to the secret of the wonderful financial vitality and prosperity of the French nation. The road system of France has been of far greater value to the country as the means of raising the value of lands and of putting the small peasant proprietors in easy communication with their markets than have the railroads.

Just a little way up Antrim street you will find a neat and pleasant little grocery store where all staple articles can be bought at money saving prices.

The Butterfly's Eye Spots.

What do the eye spots on butterflies' wings mean? The naturalist, says Mr. Percy Collins, must answer frankly, "I do not know." It is thought that they have some utilitarian application, and they form one of the most intricate of all natural designs. The fact that butterflies have been captured with their eye spots pierced, as if from attack of birds, has been used as an argument in favor of the view that they may be "protective markings," imitating eyes, because birds strike at the eyes of their victims. But this suggestion is hardly regarded as satisfactory. Among butterflies the most striking examples of eye spots are found on the underaurface of the wings.—Youth's Companion.

The Old Time Jury.

Grievances of present day jurymen are mild compared with those inflicted on them in the past. Until the passing of an act of parliament in 1870 British jurymen were prohibited from having meat, drink or fire (candlelight only excepted) while considering their verdict. In some ancient courts they were even subjected to physical violence. They were told to "lay their heads together" as an indispensable preliminary to finding a verdict. No sooner did the jury dive beneath the level of their boxes than an usher, armed with a willow wand, took up a position near them. If any juryman presumed to come to the surface before the verdict was arrived at, down came the wand on the head of the offender.

Neighborhood Notes

We are in receipt of the report of the state treasurer issued May 20. It is an interesting document. According to figures as shown therein, the receipts for the general fund for the month of May were $409,000.81. The disbursements for May were $342,469.11. The expenditures from the general fund for the preceding year exceeded the receipts by $1,282,111.25. On June 1 the state had cash on hand amounting to $3,508.93 and some receiver's accounts and funds not available.

Monday evening the cement mill closed down for an indefinite period—until the storehouses are cleaned of about 20,000 barrels of manufactured product the management think from fourteen to twenty-one days. This year the mill started two weeks earlier than in 1908, starting the men at work when they needed employment that much earlier. Facts are they can stand a lay off now much better than in the early spring. Of course not all the men will be out of work, as shipments must continue and sacking must be done, and probably about thirty hands aside from the office force will find employment. The company have sold more cement this year than during the same period in any previous season, but the production has been greater, and in the early spring shipments did not keep pace with the output, and there has been an accumulation constantly going on until the storage capacity is taxed to its utmost. Friday 1000 barrels went out by rail and Saturday 1000, and these were but ordinary days for shipments. The furnace will start about July 1 and everybody will find employment and there will be work for outsiders.—Elk Rapids Progress.

The League of Michigan Municipalities closed the eleventh annual convention at Flint Friday with reports from different cities on the problems confronting them. Lawton T. Hemans was re-elected president; Charles E Cartier, Ludington, vice president; E. R. Schreiter, Detroit, secretary-treasurer. Mayors John S. Bennett, of Lansing; Eugene C. Schupp, Hillsdale; B. H. Custer, Eaton Rapids; William Waltz, Ann Arbor, and John Burns, St. Louis, were chosen for the board of directors. The 1910 convention will be held at Lansing.

The Buckley & Douglas Lumber Company, of Manistee, have purchased 6,000 acres of hemlock in Kalkaska county and is adjacent to the newly extended Manistee & Northern railroad. The tract cost $300,000 and was purchased of the R. G. Peters Salt & Lumber company. The purchase of that piece of timber will prolong a considerable time the life of the Buckley & Douglas mills in Manistee. By the extension of the Manistee & North Eastern and by the purchase of the new tract the Buckley & Douglas and the Sands Salt & Lumber company will have about 400,000,000 feet more cut to make.—Mesick Sun.

Even the druggists in the local option county of Gratiot have gone dry. At a meeting of the County Druggists' association at Alma a formal resolution was adopted binding all the druggists not to sell liquor even on prescription, after the expiration of their present government licenses, June 30.

Barring "blind pigs" or "bootleggers" this action will absolutely prevent the gratification of a desire for liquor in Gratiot county after this month.

NEW GASOLINE CAN LAW

State Oil Inspector Calls Attention to Changes Made.

State Oil Inspector Neal calls the public's attention to a few changes made by the present legislature in the so called "Red Can" Gasoline act. The new law, which goes into effect September 1 next, provides that cans, buckets, barrels, etc., which are to be painted a bright red, may be "lettered" with the word gasoline instead of being "stenciled" as heretofore. It also provides that retail merchants must have the barrels or tanks in their stores, from which they sell, painted bright red and lettered thereon with the word gasoline.

The delivery to consumers, and to dealers as well, must be made only in receptacles cans, buckets, jugs, barrels or whatever the delivery is made in, that are painted bright red and lettered.

The tanks or cans on peddlers' wagons must be painted and lettered and the tank wagons of wholesalers must be labeled if containing gasoline.

The person who purchases gasoline lays himself liable to a fine if he has it in anything but the proper receptacle. For cleaning purposes gasoline can only be sold in bottles properly labeled, and not more than one quart in quantity.

BLUE RIBBON MEETING

Renewal of M. & M. and Chamber of Commerce Classics

With more good horses in training than in other years the blue ribbon meeting at Detroit, July 26 to 30, promises to be the best renewal during the quarter century of activity on the part of the Detroit Driving Club, Detroit holds the place of honor, its meeting being the inaugural of the grand circuit, and for this reason the racing is better than in any other city, because it is the first clash among the horses.

During the winter and early spring upwards of five hundred horses were in training at Memphis, Macon, Selma, and other southern points. Many of these have moved to the north where they have been joined by hundreds of others. At the Michigan state fair grounds alone two hundred are being prepared for their campaign. The backwardness of the spring has not affected the speed of the horses, for June 1 found them far advanced all along the line, some of the early work being a surprise to the trainers, themselves.

Detroit again gives its famous M. & M. and Chamber of Commerce classics. There are two other stakes and this quartette will be surrounded by about fifteen purse events, making a program of rare excellence. The M. & M. is twenty years old this summer. From its inception it has been the one race that is talked about winter and summer and this year's renewal is expected to be the 1909 sensation of the turf.

COPIED NAPOLEON.

South American Dictators Who Imitated the French Despot.

The dictatorship of Castro in Venezuela has been compared with that of President Francia, who terrorized Paraguay for over thirty years. Francia was a worshiper of Napoleon, whom he endeavored to imitate in every possible way. He possesses only one portrait of his idol, a German carbature, which depicted the emperor wearing an exaggerated version of the famous gray overcoat. Francia took this picture seriously and for many years paraded the streets of Asuncion clad in a gray dressing gown and a cocked hat, which he fondly believed to be the habilliat garb of the French despot.

Castro's most distinguished predecessor was also a Napoleon devotee, but Bolivar had seen his idol and could thus imitate him more faithfully. He managed to acquire the emperor's brusque speech and other mannerisms, pulled people's ears when in a good humor and dictated dispatches to several secretaries at once. He founded an order closely modeled on the Legion of Honor; surrounded himself with a guard of negroes from Haiti, after the style of Napoleon's mamelukes, and endeavored to codify the laws of his country. When he returned to America after witnessing Napoleon's coronation Bolivar entered Caracas standing in a Roman chariot drawn by twelve maidens belonging to the first families of the town.—London Chronicle.

Farm and Garden

RAT PROOF GRANARY AND CRIB

Vermin Beaten on Their Own Ground by a Concrete Building.

The waste of grain on the farm caused by rats and mice every year cannot be estimated. No matter how many cats or rat terriers the farmer may have, the rodents cannot be everywhere, and they do sleep while the rats are at work. A rat proof granary is the only sure remedy. Such a building can be constructed at a nominal cost.

The illustration in this article shows the exterior of a building constructed of concrete.

The foundation walls can be constructed of concrete blocks or of solid concrete, as wished. In case solid cement foundation walls are used the forms can be made of boards as I for any building of 10 by 15 feet or over they should be twelve inches thick. To properly protect the building from the vermin it should float least twenty-four inches high.

A water table is now molded around the four sides of the foundation wall. This project at least four inches, and better, six inches, so as to prevent the rats climbing over, even if they succeed in getting that far up the foundation wall. This water table is cast in convenient lengths in a plain box form and then laid on foundation wall, the same as an ordinary concrete block.

The side walls of the building are made by taking two boards, each one foot wide, and after cutting to the length of the building bore one inch holes the length of the boards, as illustrated in the small cut. In these place short lengths of gas pipe. This will mold in the wall a one inch hole, or one-half inch if desired, each six inches apart, to provide for the curing of the corn when placed in the cribs.

These boards are used to mold both side walls by placing eight upright 2 by 4 scantling posts, one outside and one inside the space where wall is to be, at each corner. If wall is to be eight inches in width these posts must be exactly eight inches apart and securely fastened at top and bottom.

Prepare two boards, each a foot wide, with holes bored every six inches for each end wall. These boards are nailed to the boards for side walls, so that you have two square boxes, one the size of the building inside and the other the size of the exterior, the forms being a foot high. The forms are placed on the foundation walls above the water table and the lengths of gas pipe placed in position. The forms are filled with concrete mortar of the proportions of one part cement, two parts sand and four parts of gravel or crushed stone. This mortar is tamped into the forms well, and within an hour or at the most two hours after the form is filled it can be raised about eleven inches for the next course. In doing this remove the lengths of gas pipe, then raise the form evenly so that it is about eleven inches above top of concrete already molded.

The inside walls can be constructed of lumber or concrete, as desired; the same as the idea in the granary proper. Where adjustable boards for bins are desired a strip nailed to the inside of forms at the right place will mold a groove in the concrete wall which will hold the boards as desired.

The floor of the entire building should be built of concrete. The foundation walls are filled in up to level of top of water table. This is then packed down four inches and the concrete floor laid upon this dirt filling. To the finishing of the floor add a mixture of one part cement in three parts sand and smooth with a trowel.

ELECTRIFYING THE SOIL

Interesting Experiments by Farmers In the North of Germany.

At Hoppegarten, near Berlin, Dr. Breslauer has given a practical demonstration of the fact that existing technical means admit of the crops being considerably improved at no very great cost by the application of the electric current. The experiments which have been made for thirty years past in Sweden, England and Germany have led to a conclusion important for the future of agriculture. Farmers have long known that frequent thunderstorms, such as often occur in the north German lowlands during the summer months, have a very favorable influence on the growth of the crops. More than thirty years ago the Swedish professor Lemstrom proved that the rapid growth of plants in the polar regions was attributable to the strong electricity of the air found in those parts. Generally speaking, the first attempt to increase fertility by spanning a net charged with electricity across the fields was carried out by a Dr Prinsheim on his property at Kryschanowitz, near Breslau. He succeeded in obtaining an increased production of 12% per cent from strawberries, 120 to 140 per cent from beet root and 32 per cent in the case of beans and barley. But the necessity for always having to remove a pot which was stretched across the ground at a very low height before the usual agricultural work could be proceeded with made the process too expensive for practical utility. The electrical engineer Neumann then tried a net with strong alternating currents, which still proved effective when erected at the height of five meters from the ground. In this manner no long ladders for harvesters at their work. Experience soon showed that an equally large result could be obtained by erecting flat masts at intervals of ten meters and attached to one another by thin wire. Sir Oliver Lodge was able to prove that by this system an increased production of from 20 to 40 per cent in wheat and barley could be obtained. The practical value of the electrically fertilized wheat was tested by the agricultural chemist Dr. Kreusler, of Poppelsdorf, near Bonn. The results, which have been carefully noted, have been carried out on a large scale by Dr Stoeppler near Immendingen, above the Gorman farmers of the practical utility of this process.

Horseless Cultivator a Success.

What the inventor says will be a great boon to small farmers, as the invention, it is claimed, will do the work of six horses, is in use in California, but it can be adapted to any locality. It is a gasoline tractor and is a help in plowing, harrowing, and harvesting. It will keep running as long as it is fed gasoline.

Built with a two cylinder motor, the tractor has plenty of power. It has two speeds, forward and reverse, and is easily operated from an extension seat, from which the same position a driver would occupy with his team.

It is particularly an orchard tractor, having low, wide wheels, narrow tread, short wheel base and short turning radius. A special feature is that the tractor may be driven from the seat of the ordinary wheel plow or harrow, enabling one man to drive and operate the levers of this plow and cultivator with perfect ease and convenience. It is a one man machine, light in weight, with all control levers conveniently arranged.

To obtain the greatest efficiency the front wheels are made the traction wheels; also the steering wheels. In the rear are smaller plain wheels, close together, with flanges to hold against side slipping, used simply as trailers, to which the plow, cultivator, harrow or farm wagon is hitched, the same as though coupled to the small wheels used on the rear of the ordinary tongue when plowing with a team.

The power plant is built in a stiff steel frame, mounted rigidly to the main axle, and is composed of a two cylinder opposed engine of standard make, rated at twenty-four horsepower. The cost of the new invention is $1,000.

Beet Sugar All Right.

Owing to an opinion sometimes expressed that beet sugar is not as satisfactory for making preserves and jellies as cane sugar, the California experiment station studied the question under commercial and domestic conditions. Of 2,000 cans of cherries, apricots, plums, peaches and pears prepared with syrups of different strengths and stored for two years in cases under rather unfavorable conditions only six cans from the beet sugar lot and seven cans from the cane sugar lot were found to be spoiled, evidently owing to imperfect sealing. This shows, according to a report of the station, "the utter lack of foundation for the idea that fruits do not keep well when preserved with beet sugar and that such sugar does not work well in the cannery."

Time to Trim Berry Fields.

Now is a good time to trim the raspberry and blackberry fields. Not much fruit can be expected from feeble canes, and even the best canes will not give much fruit if they are too close together. Manure or fertilizer is also required. Blackberry fields have been known to give good service for years without fertilizers, but if the field is given good cultivation and well supplied with plant food the increased yield and better quality of the fruit will make some unprofitable fields pay well.

Birds Necessary to Man's Existence.

A French naturalist asserts that if the world should become birdless man could not inhabit it after nine years' time in spite of all the sprays and poisons that could be manufactured for the destruction of insects. The insects and slugs would simply eat all the orchards and crops in that time.

Modern Complications.

It is pretty hard for a girl to tell whether it is better to be so polite as to pretend that she is not shocked when she is or so refined as to pretend she is shocked when she isn't.

There is also the complicated case of the man who won't work at all unless he is praised for it and when he is praised for it becomes too chesty to work.—Exchange.

Counts Eggs as Laid.

The old hotel hen with cannibalistic tendencies can no longer defraud her employer with impunity, and if she likes eggs for her meals she is in danger of decapitation. Two Wisconsin men have put their heads together and have perfected a registering device which keeps a record of every egg laid and enables chicken owners to detect any loss through theft or any other agency. This device is in the form of a band that fits over the hen's body. The expansion of the body caused by the emission of the egg causes the band to spread and register a number. If the indicator shows that a hen is laying more eggs than are collected and if the owner finds no evidence of theft he can then be sure that the bird is eating the eggs herself and either put her in the stewpan and replace her with a more honest fowl or keep such a close watch over her that she will not have an opportunity to indulge her cannibalistic taste. It is impossible to cure a hen of this habit once it is contracted.

FASTENS ON BIRD'S BODY.

No Money In Average Yields.

M. D. White, expert in dairy of the bureau of animal industry, says that in some of the dairy states the average yield of butter per cow is less than 150 pounds per annum, when it is possible under quite ordinary condition with grade cows of dairy breeds to produce double that amount, 300 pounds. This is considerably less than one pound a day. Evidently, he says, there is plenty of room for improvement. By proper selection, care, feed and breeding of dairy cows the output of dairy products can be doubled without increasing the number of cows now in the country.

Records In the Dairy.

In a progressive New Jersey dairy the cows are divided into four sections of twelve each, numbered and known respectively as A, B, C and D. In front of each animal, on a wire running from end to end of the room, is a card, giving the cow's number on one side and on the other such data as the time the animal should come fresh, the length of time milked, the percentage of butter fat and remarks. As each cow's milk is analyzed at frequent intervals, the milk produced by a section can be kept at a uniform average of 4 per cent fat. When one section's percentage or production is noticed to be running low it is a simple matter to replace low with high testing cows, so that with very slight work the quality of the milk can be kept uniform throughout the year.

In the reign of Edward III. there were eminent clothiers and woolen weavers whose family name was Blanket. They were the first persons who manufactured that comfortable material which has ever since been called by their name and which was then used for peasants' clothing.

LEGAL NOTICES

Mortgage Sale.

Default having been made in the conditions of a certain mortgage made by Daniel Faust and Ida J. Faust, his wife, to Peter Tuttle, dated the 20th day of November, A. D. 1905, and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds for the County of Charlevoix, and State of Michigan, on the 16th day of June, A. D. 1905, in Liber 33 of Mortgages on page 502, and duly assigned by said Peter Tuttle to Laura A. Scott by assignment in writing dated October 20th, 1905 and recorded in said Register's office on October 28th, 1905, in Liber 31 of Mortgages on page 386, on which mortgage there is claimed to be due at the date of this notice the sum of nine hundred forty dollars and seventy-seven cents, and an attorney's fee of twenty-five dollars, provided for in said mortgage and no suit or proceedings at law or in equity having been instituted to recover the moneys secured by said mortgage or any part thereof:

Now, therefore, by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and the statute in such case made and provided, notice is hereby given that on Thursday, the 26th day of August, A. D. 1909, at ten o'clock in the forenoon the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises therein described at public auction to the highest bidder, at the east front door of the court house in the city of Charlevoix, county of Charlevoix and state of Michigan (that being the place where the circuit court for said county of Charlevoix is held) or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the amount due on said mortgage, with 7 per cent interest, and all legal costs, together with an attorney's fee of twenty-five dollars, as provided by law and as covenanted for therein, the premises being described in said mortgage as follows, to wit:

All of the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section twenty four in township thirty-three north of range seven west, containing forty acres of land, more or less, according to the United States survey thereof, excepting one half acre for school house site, together with all tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining. 2413

The Captain of the Kansas.

By LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Wings of the Morning," "The Pillar of Light," Etc.

Copyright, 1905, by Edward J. Clode.

"Then the process has commenced already. The Kansas should have been reported yesterday from Sandy Point. The news that she has not arrived will soon reach the nearest cable station. There will be terrific excitement at Lloyd's when that becomes known. By the way, does any one here know a man named Ventana?"

"It is a name common enough in Chile," said Christobal.

"If you mean Senor Pedro Ventana, who is associated with Mr. Baring in mining matters, I am acquainted with him," said Elsie.

They all looked at her, and some of them wondered perhaps why her smiling eyes had lost their mirth. Yet there was nothing unreasonable in the mere fact that a certain Chilean named Ventana, who had business relations with Mr. Baring, should make the acquaintance of Isobel Baring's friend. As quickly as it had arisen the feeling of strangeness passed.

Courtenay even laughed. Elsie as the Jonah of the ship was a quaint conceit.

"I mentioned Ventana because I was told he took some part of the insurance on his own account," he explained. "But he was a member of Baring's copper syndicate and indeed was spoken of as a mining engineer of high repute. Believe me, I was not jumping to conclusions on that account."

"I know him to be a very bad man," said Elsie slowly. Her face was white and her eyes downcast. It was evident that the sudden introduction of Ventana's personality was distressing to her, but Courtenay, preoccupied with the dastardly attempt made to sink his ship, did not observe this feature of a peculiar discussion.

"Bad! In what sense, Miss Maxwell?" he asked unguardedly.

"In the most loathsome sense. He is evil minded, vicious, altogether detestable. If Mr Baring knew his character as I know it, Ventana would not be allowed to enter his office."

"Pedro Ventana?" interrupted Christobal. "Is he a half caste, a tall, brown skinned man, who affects an American drawl when he speaks English—a man prominent in Santiago society and in mining circles generally?"

"Yes," said Elsie.

"That is odd, exceedingly so. I once heard a rumor—but perhaps it is unfair to mention it in this connection. Yet it cannot hurt any one if I state that Isobel Baring and he were—well, how shall I put it?—at any rate, there was a lively summer hotel sort of attachment between them."

"Isobel has never told me that," said Elsie, nerving herself for a personal disclosure which was obviously disagreeable. "I own a small ranch near Quillota, and as there was a chance of copper being located there Mr. Barlug advised me to employ Ventana as an expert prospector. Indeed, Mr. Baring himself sent Ventana to examine the property and report on it. He came to see me. He told me there were no minerals of value on my land, but I could never free myself from him afterward. In fact, I am running away from him now."

She uttered the concluding words with a genuine indignation which forthwith evaporated in its unconscious humor. Everybody laughed, even the girl herself, and Boyle grunted:

"Huh—shows the beggar's good taste anyhow."

Courtenay perhaps thought that if he encountered Ventana again he would take the opportunity to reason with him in the approved manner of the high seas. And as there was no need to prolong a topic which caused Elsie any sort of embarrassment he hastened to say:

"I have brought names into the discussion largely to show what a doubtful field is opened once we begin to suspect without real cause. The only witness of any value we have on board is Frasenelo, and his evidence merely goes to prove a secret design to interfere with or control the trimming of the bunker. That particular hatch must be sealed and the specimens we have secured put away under lock and key. I feel assured that the remainder of our coal is above suspicion. We can carry the inquiry no further while we remain here. Now, Mr. Walker, you have something of a more cheering nature to communicate, I think."

The engineer grinned genially.

"I don't wish to bind myself to a day or so, Miss Maxwell and gentlemen," he said, "but I've had a good look at the damage, an' I feel pwitty shu-aw I'll get up steam in one boil-aw within ten days or a fawtnight. It'll be a makeshift job at the best, because I have so few spa-aw fittin's an' no chance of makin' a castin', but I'll bet a ye'aw's pay the Kansas gets a move on her undaw her own steam soon aftaw New Ye-aw's day."

New Year's day! What a lump in the throat the words brought! In three days it would be Christmas, in seven more the new year! Though from the beginning of the voyage they were prepared to pass both festivals at sea, there was all the difference in the world between a steady progress toward home and friends and the present plight of the Kansas. Death, too, had thrown its shadow over them. Some there were to whom the passing of the years would mean no more in this world. Others, the great majority of the ship's company, were probably bidden by the same eternal silence. The last sight they had of them was a dim vision of boats rushing into a chaos of angry seas and sheeted spray.

But Courtenay would have none of these mournful memories. "Isn't that glorious news?" he cried. "Now, Christobal, that motor trip in June through the Pyrenees looks feasible once more. And you, Miss Maxwell, though you have never quailed for an instant, can hope to be in England in the spring. As for you, Tollemache, surely you will say that our prospects are 'fair' at the least."

"I would say more than that if it were not for these poisonous Indians," replied Tollemache. "Here they come now, a whole canoe load of 'em. I have never seen such rotters."

And, indeed, Francisco Suarez, detailed to keep watch and ward over the ship until noon, ran up the companion and cried excitedly:

"Four headmen have just pulled off from Otter creek. They have missed me, I expect. They will want me to go back. I beseech you senor captain, not to give me up to them, but rather to send a bullet through my miserable heart."

"Tell him to calm himself," said Courtenay coolly when Christobal had translated this flow of guttural Spanish. "He has no cause to fear them now. Let him nerve himself and show a bold front. A palaver is the best thing that can happen. We must display all the arms we possess. Bid any of your lubbers who can stand upright show themselves, Christobal. We must lift you outside, Boyle. Bring your camera, Miss Maxwell. If we could give these fellows a good picture of themselves it would scare them to death."

Courtenay infected them all with his splendid optimism. It was with curiosity rather than dread that they watched the rapid approach of the canoe and its almost naked occupants.

NEW TYPE OF ROAD.

Combination of Brick and Concrete With Sand to Distribute Pressure.

With contract work about to begin on millions of dollars' worth of new roads in New York state there is naturally much curiosity as to whether or not any new ideas in construction will be tried. The state engineer's recent report indicates that the ordinary macadam does not last well under the impact and friction of automobile traffic which is rapidly increasing, and roads well suited for the demands of a decade ago fail to give satisfaction proportionate with their cost under modern conditions.

It is improbable that the ideal form of construction has been discovered, although the building methods are very numerous. A Brooklyn inventor claims to have embodied scientific ideas in a form of road for which he has been granted patents and for which he makes strong claims. It has a surface of paving brick block joined with cement and supported by large blocks of concrete. Through each block run several vertical holes, and in these, according to the inventor, lies the virtue of the idea.

The holes are filled with sharp sand, and between the brick surface and the supporting blocks is placed an inch layer of sand. This road, it is held, cannot be broken down. The sand distributes pressure upon the surface against the sides of the holes instead of vertically. Drawing moisture from the ground, it will present a springy, elastic base, for which a life of many years is anticipated. The new road has many other advantages—in theory, at least. It is probable that an offer will be made to give an actual illustration of its value to those interested in the construction of new state highways.

AUTOMOBILE ROAD TEST.

Norristown, Pa., to Find Out How Motor Cars Affect Highways.

In resenting the imputation that automobiles are more harmful to improved highways than horse drawn vehicles Assemblyman Rex of Norristown, Pa., at the annual convention of supervisors the other day suggested that a practical test be made to demonstrate the relative wear and tear of both classes of vehicles on public roads.

He offered to contribute to the construction of such a road, which will be composed of two parallel highways exactly alike. Over one of these roads horse drawn vehicles are to pass and over the other the automobiles.

Lesson in Good Roads.

The state engineer of New York in a recent report says that in 1907 New York built 314 miles of good roads and in 1908 820 miles. The taxpayers have authorized the expenditure of $50,000,000 for roads, and the legislature has added $11,000,000. It is stated that the contention for good roads had to be waged for years to get the work started. The farmers were the strongest in opposition. New Jersey and Massachusetts took up the work before New York, but now the Empire State is getting in line. By the time the $61,000,000 shall have been spent the three states, which all join at points, will have a great system of roads. One may leave Philadelphia and reach Boston on highways smooth and solid. A good automobile may easily beat the trains on this trip, and surely the pleasure is much greater.

Highway Seven Hundred Miles Long.

A highway stretching in a direct line of 700 miles from Atlanta to Washington is now the subject of promotion on the part of the Good Roads club of Georgia.

He—Does your father know that I am the light of your life?

She—Oh, yes; he said to be sure to put you out at 10 o'clock.

Woman's World

SHE EARNS $10,000 A YEAR.

Miss Katherine I. Harrison, Private Secretary to the Late H. H. Rogers.

Katherine I. Harrison, private secretary to the late H. H. Rogers, is harder to reach than J. P. Morgan, James Stillman, John W. Gates or any other of the kings of finance. She is the one woman in the world who knows everything that goes on in Standard Oil. For doing what she is required to do—and not the least of her duties is to keep her mouth sealed—she receives $10,000 a year. You might count on your fingers the women in the United States who receive this salary.

What made Katherine I. Harrison so valuable to H. H. Rogers and his partners in the Standard Oil? A hundred answers could be given to this question. Other women are as bright, and other women are possessed of equal executive ability. But the best answer of them all may be summed up in two words—absolute trustworthiness.

Miss Harrison can keep a secret. She can hold information inviolate that would make a poor man a millionaire.

MISS KATHERINE I. HARRISON.

There are men who would pay a king's ransom to know a tithe of what she knows.

This important personage in the Standard Oil is tall and spare—close to six feet. Her face is stern, but comely. Altogether she is an attractive type of the American business woman. She dresses well, but severely. Her favorite office dress is a plain but short skirt of dullish blue, a white shirt waist, a blue four-in-hand tie and a turndown collar. When she goes out she wears a short, closely cut jacket of covert cloth and a toque trimmed with feathers. Her shoes are low cut and have broad soles.

But first of all the observer notes Miss Harrison's eyeglasses. They are set in a golden bow and have great, thick lenses. When you try to look at her through these fortresses of glass you see yourself reflected in tiny replica. On the contrary, they magnify to you Miss Harrison's steady, insistent eyes until they wring from you your secret.

Miss Harrison wrote most of Mr. Rogers' letters. She signed many of his checks. She never committed her employer to anything.

Miss Harrison lives with her mother and two sisters in a handsome Queen Anne house at 1354 Dean street, Brooklyn. She contributes to the welfare of the family and has a pretty fortune.

And how old is Miss Harrison? Well, she was Mr. Rogers' private secretary for eighteen years. She may be thirty-five; she may be more.

Next to Mrs. Hetty Green she ranks today as probably the most important business woman in all New York.

HELPS FOR THE HOUSEHOLD.

Squeeze a few drops of lemon in the water in which potatoes are boiled just before they are done and they will not turn black.

If soda is mixed with flour in making ginger cookies with sour milk instead of being dissolved in milk, as is the usual way, they will be lighter.

Paint that sticks to glass can be removed with hot vinegar.

Cleaning pots and pans is the bugbear of the cook. It is hard work at best, and if left until after the dishes are washed it hangs over one as a burden. One easy way is to keep a supply of newspapers in the kitchen, and as soon as a skillet is emptied pour in it a little boiling water, then throw the water out and rub skillet with a large piece of paper. If the frying pan is not clean add a little more water and finally polish until dry with a fresh piece of paper and hang away before other work is attempted.

To keep milk toast from being soggy, as it too frequently is, try serving the boiling, buttered milk in a covered pitcher, passing it with crisp, hot toast. In this way each person can have toast as soft or as crisp as desired.

The housekeeper who wants "the best" does her own marketing, and does it early, before the foodstuffs are picked over or wilted from the hot sun.

More Americans should understand cooking with curry powder. It makes a delicious change for the cooking of meats, rice, eggs and fish. An Anglo-Indian will tell you we know nothing of the use of curries, but that is no reason why we should not learn.

There are fewer reckoning days if housekeepers pay cash. If they persist in running accounts for groceries and other staples they should have a book and see to it that the right price is put down the minute anything is bought.

Director of Reformative Institution.

Dr. Katherine Bement Davis of Bedford, N. Y., is the superintendent of the New York State Reformatory For Women and has been able to do much for the unfortunate women committed to her charge. A thorough collegiate and special training has fitted Dr Davis for her important work, and she possesses unusual administrative ability. Poise, firmness, judgment, sympathy and good sense are her distinguishing traits.

Regarded generally as one of the expert authorities of the subject of the proper treatment of delinquent women, Dr. Davis is frequently called upon to make addresses before women's clubs and societies.

Dr. Davis' medical skill was put to good service during the recent catastrophe in Messina, where she gave great aid to the suffering and helpless.

DEVELOPMENT BUREAU

Of West Michigan Met at Manistee May 29

Three Classes of Membership Provided for—Will Meet Again July 16

A meeting of the West Michigan Development Bureau was held at Manistee May 29, at which time some minor details of organization were completed, and certain modifications made in the by-laws to conform to the changes made.

The matter of membership which had not been perfected was arranged by providing for three classes of membership: First, the counties to become members of the association upon payment of $50, either by the county direct, or by an individual or an association in its behalf, the presumption being that this expense will be borne by boards of trade and, commercial bodies; Second, transportation companies in the territory are to be admitted to membership on payment of $50, save that lines operating less than 100 miles of track, may be admitted at the discretion of the board of control for $25; Third, individuals may become members upon the payment of $1, and in this class it is hoped to enlist thousands of the progressive element in the various counties and communities. A change in the by-laws makes possible the admission of ladies to the organization.

The sources of revenue are outlined as coming from the heavy donations of the greater business interests, the dues of individual members and the lawful levy of a tax authorized by the Michigan statutes for such purposes. This law has never been taken advantage of for the reason that the amount which could be raised by any one county would be too small to amount to much; but, with the forces of several counties amalgamated in one organization the amount assumes proportions with which to accomplish much. Annual dues will be another source of income, but these were left to be fixed at the next meeting in Frankfort, July 16.

It was voted to expend an amount not exceeding $150 to bring before the people of the district the purposes and opportunities of the bureau through the newspapers of the several counties.

Through the Pere Marquette railroad was offered space for an exhibit in the National Land and Irrigation Exposition at Chicago November 27 to December 4, at an expense of $2,250 which was accepted and the bureau will undertake to sublet spaces and see that an adequate exhibit is provided. This, after some discussion was thought to be a great opportunity to bring before the great buying public, just now more than ordinarily interested in lands, the many opportunities and advantages of the region.

OFFICERS ARE ELECTED

By the Odd Fellows at Meeting Held Wednesday Night

Round Lake lodge I. O. O. F. elected the following officers at their last meeting held Wednesday night.

N. G.—Marshall Randall.
V. G.—George Taylor.
R. S.—Richard Lewis.
F. S.—A. Hunshew.
Treasurer—F. E. Wood.
Representatives—Archie Allcock and George Marsac.
Alternates—A. Hunshew and F. E. Wood.

The other officers will be appointed at the time of installation which will take place next month.

The order has had an exceedingly prosperous year taking in new members nearly every meeting. Friday night about forty members attended the meeting of the lodge at East Jordan where they conferred the first degree, and of course had a bully time.

A Narrow Escape.

When Mr. Hartman returned an hour later than usual, Mrs. Hartman asked him the reason, and his good natured face was solemn as he answered her. "I haf had one narrow escape from drowning, Katchen," he said.

"How was that happen?" asked his wife as she helped him unwind the knitted scarf from his neck. "Tell to me it at once, Hans."

"It was at the ferry that I came late," said Mr. Hartman, "from the blocked cars, and the boat she was just starting. A man he called me out, 'Joomp, joomp!' and for one moment I thought to make as he said. But I remluded myself to be cautious and wait, and in one minute more, Katchen, came a great patch of water showing! Then I look holt of the post wherely I stood and said to myself, 'Hans, you were the wise man that you joumped not at first when that man advised.'"—Youth's Companion.

Cracked Furniture.

Ugly marks caused by splits or cracked places in furniture are easily filled in with beeswax, and the mark is never detected. In fact, this is how furniture dealers cover such blemishes. First slightly soften the beeswax until it is like putty, then press firmly to the cracks and smooth evenly with a thin knife. Sandpaper over the surrounding wood and work the dust into the beeswax. This gives a wood finish or color, and when the furniture is varnished you will look in vain for the blemishes. It is better than putty, since putty soon dries, crumbles and falls out, while beeswax will remain forever just where it is placed.

Sea water analyses show the presence of about one grain of gold to the ton of water—thousands of millions of tons of yellow wealth in old ocean's keeping, safe doubtless. But should any one desire to know this exact wealth it may be stated that there are 4,205,550,000 tons of water in a cubic mile and 302,000,000 cubic miles in the ocean. There is even more silver than gold in ocean water.

GOOD ROAD DRAGGERS

Organization For Improving Highways Formed at Sturgeon, Mo.

BEGINNING OF A GREAT WORK.

How the Members of the Brotherhood of Draggers Have Pledged Themselves to Work For Improved Roads. Convicts For Road Building.

There was a good roads crusade recently started at Sturgeon, Mo., which is deserving of warmest praise. At the head is a farmer, George W. Batterton, who has been an enthusiast on the subject for the past forty years and who four years ago decided it was time to practice some of the principles he had been preaching and set a good example for his neighbors. Accordingly he made a drag of oak lumber, and to the edge of the front piece he bolted a blade of steel, made by the local blacksmith, which acted as a light scraper to throw the dirt collected in front of the drag to the center of the road. When he visited Sturgeon, three miles distant, he attached this drag to the rear of his wagon or buggy and dragged the roads both coming and going. In this way he consumed very little more time in making the trip to and from town and in the course of a year had made a road which he and the residents of the section claim today superior to rock roads eleven months in the year, while at no time does it become so muddy as to impair seriously its usefulness in hauling heavy loads over it when it is at its worst.

It is as smooth and hard as a boulevard today, though there were heavy rains recently for two days at Sturgeon and in its vicinity. Mr. Batterton is so afflicted with rheumatism he can hardly walk. Still he has made three miles of country boulevard practically with his own efforts in four years.

With this inspiring example as an incentive the business men of Sturgeon and the farmers of the country got together a few days ago and organized a brotherhood of good road draggers, all agreeing to follow the example of attaching a drag to the vehicles in which they drive about on ordinary business. Several automobilists promised to hitch the drag to their motor cars. Bankers, farmers, doctors, gardeners, lawyers, merchants and hucksters propose to co-operate and devote themselves for one year in making and maintaining good roads, no matter what else may happen. "Dragging is the best, simplest and least expensive method to obtain good roads. There is nothing which will add so much to the prosperity and general advancement of the communities as good roads," asserts one enthusiast sounding the keynote of the brotherhood. This should be an example for other communities to follow. What has been done can be done, and the best has never yet been attained in any phase of life. The Missouri enthusiasts have started a great work. They deserve not only praise, but that imitation which is the sincerest form of flattery. There is a great awakening just at present in this matter of good roads. The Missouri legislature has passed a resolution which proposes to submit to the people the question of levying a state tax of 5 cents on each hundred dollars of assessed valuation, to be set apart and apportioned to the several counties as a permanent road fund. One Missouri county has recently put a gang of convicts to work on the public highways, ordering several portable steel cages, in which the convicts can be confined at night, so as not to lose time transporting them to and from work. All over the country supervisoral boards and city councils are getting together and deciding to do something besides talk. All these things are good, but there is something even better, and that is activity on the part of the farmer in road dragging. Let him set an example and prove the system is good and feasible and legislatures, supervisors and city councils will fall in line quickly enough. There has been plenty of talking. It is time now to go to work individually and collectively.

EXPERIMENTAL ROAD.

Details of One That Has Given the Best of Satisfaction.

Samuel S. Jones of Clinton, Wis., furnished the following details of construction of an experimental road built for educational purposes under the direction of the office of public roads, with George L. Cooley in charge:

"This road was constructed in the town of Clinton, Rock county, Wis., one mile east of the village of Clinton. In the construction of this road all the machinery was furnished by the government at no expense to the town. The town, on its part, furnished all the labor and material.

"This road commenced at the top of a clay hill and extended down the side to and across a black muck slough. Thus we had the advantage of observing the construction of and finishing under the different soil conditions. The road was first graded to a width of thirty-six feet from gutter to gutter. The trench for receiving the crushed rock of which the road was constructed was twelve feet wide. This trench was shouldered evenly at the edges. The bed of the trench of roadbed was brought to a perfect grade, having a crown of three-fourths inch to the foot from the center of crown to the side shoulders.

"When the roadbed was in proper shape for the superstructure cross drains were put in at intervals of 100 feet. These drains, which were from eight to ten inches deep and one foot while, were filled with coarse crushed stone and extended to the outside gutter, thereby insuring perfect drainage for the road when finished.

"The superstructure was built of limestone, the first layer being crushed to a size which would pass through a three inch ring. This layer was then rolled thoroughly and covered with a finer grade of stone and again rolled. This method of placing on layers and rolling was continued until fourteen inches of the loose material had been rolled to a solid bed eight inches thick. During the rolling process water was sprinkled on the different layers of stone to help cement the stone together and thereby make a perfect surface for traffic. When the road was completed as far as the coarser stone and rolling were concerned a layer of siftings from the crusher was spread evenly over the surface of the road and alternately rolled and sprinkled until no more could be worked into the roadbed either by sprinkling or rolling. The surface of the road reached that point of perfection in building where neither siftings nor water could be forced into it. The finishing of the earth shoulders, which are six feet wide on each side of the stone driveway, with just enough slant to carry off all surface water and leave a good earth road on either side made the road complete and gives us a twenty-four foot road of earth and stone.

"It was built under very expensive conditions, our shortest haul for stone being four miles. Labor cost from $3 to $4 per day, team and man from $5 to $7 per day, and even at these prices we could procure but half enough teams to keep the machinery running, thereby increasing greatly the expense. This road is giving the best of satisfaction and is fast gaining friends."

PRIZES FOR GOOD ROADS.

Fund Established by Spokane Magnate to Encourage Farmers.

Building of good roads by the farmers in Spokane and Whitman counties, Wash., and Latah county, Ida., is being materially boosted by Jay P. Graves, president of the Spokane and Inland Empire Electric railway system, who announces he will give prizes amounting to $3,000 in three yearly installments for the best mile of constructed highway in 1909, 1910 and 1911.

The offer is made by Mr. Graves as a private citizen, the primary purpose being to encourage the ranchers in the Palouse wheat district, south of Spokane, in the building of permanent roads with such materials as are at hand, though the use of concrete, macadam, oil or other substance will not disqualify competitors.

Japan's Good Roads.

Japan is peculiarly well off in respect of good highways. The Tokaido, which runs from Kyoto to Tokyo, is over 300 miles in length and is admirably constructed. There is also the Nakasendo, which is even longer and passes through some of the finest scenery in the world. The reason of Japan's excellence in the matter of roads is that in the old days—not so very long ago—the daimios, or territorial nobles, had to journey to Tokyo once a year in order to pay their respects to the sovereign. They traveled by road, with great retinues, and if the highways were not in perfect condition feudal justice was meted out to the delinquents.

Changed His Mind.

Pinero, the playwright, has the reputation of being a martinet at rehearsals, and actors and actresses who disagree with him are apt to find themselves severely taken to task. During the rehearsal of one of his plays the dramatist was much annoyed by the way in which one of the actors pronounced a certain word in the dialogue. He mildly protested, but the actor would not take the hint. "I have always pronounced the word like that, and I shall continue to do so," he said. "My dear sir," retorted Mr. Pinero suavely, "by all means do as you think best. I would not deprive you of one of your laughs for the world!" At the next rehearsal the actor changed his mind.—Argonaut.

Section 3. In addition to the amounts named in section two hereof there shall be assessed and levied on all the taxable property of said city as shown by the assessment roll for the year 1909, the additional sum of three mills on each dollar valuation of said property to be placed in said roll under the head of interest and sinking fund and to be paid into said fund when collected.

Section 4. There shall also be assessed and levied on all the taxable real and personal property of street district No. 1 the sum of three hundred dollars to be levied pro rata on such valuation, the same being not to exceed one-fourth of one per cent thereof. In street district No. 2 there shall be assessed and levied on the taxable real and personal property of said district the sum of five hundred dollars, the same being not to exceed one-fourth on one per cent of the valuation of such district. One street district No. 3 there shall be assessed and levied on the taxable real and personal property in such district the sum of two hundred dollars, the same being not to exceed one-fourth of one per cent of the assessed valuation of the real and personal property of said district. All sums so assessed and levied to be paid when collected into the respective street funds above named.

Section 5. The sums above mentioned are hereby appropriated in the several funds as hereto set forth.

Section 6. The city assessor is hereby required and instructed to assess and levy said amounts as herein provided according to law, together with all unpaid special assessments heretofore assessed and levied upon any and all property of the city, and also all sidewalk assessments not yet paid, the said sidewalk assessments to be spread as a special tax against the property and against the person or persons liable therefor as provided by the ordinances of said city.

Section 7. The city treasurer is hereby required and instructed to collect said taxes as spread on said assessment roll and to credit all amounts so collected to the several funds as herein specified, pro rata as the proportion of the several amounts to said funds shall bear to the total of all taxes as spread on the assessment roll and collected herein.

Adopted at a regular meeting of the common council of the City of Charlevoix held at council rooms on the 8th day of June, 1909.

TOOK PLACE TUESDAY EVENING, JUNE 5

Bride Only Daughter of Mayor and Mrs. O. E. Wilbur

Groom Prominent Charlevoix Business Man —Large Number of Invited Guests— Will be Home July 1.

One of the prettiest home weddings that ever took place in this city occurred Tuesday evening June 15, at the home of the bride's parents Mayor and Mrs. O. E. Wilbur, the principals being Miss Calla E. Wilbur and Wilbur A. Cline, Rev. W. Bedford-Jones, of Emanuel Episcopal church Petoskey officiating.

The house was most beautifully decorated in white lilacs and river moss. At the appointed hour the bridal party, consisting of the bride and groom, maid of honor Miss Charlotte Remington of Milwaukee, and best man Bert Wilbur, brother of the bride, flower girl, Elizabeth Chase, of Traverse City, and ring bearer, William L. Chase, of Traverse City. Peter Vandermade and Gorge Finncan acting as ushers, to the strains of the wedding march played by Mrs. E. H. Green and daughter, entered the room through an aisle formed by ropes of white lilacs, held by the Misses Marion Harris, Nita Mayne, Helen Smith, Lorraine and Marjorie Washburn and Alma Francis and took their position in the bay window, which had been formed into a canopy made of river moss and snowballs, a pendant of snowballs hanging in the center, under which the bridal party took their station.

The bride's gown was white messaline, trimmed with lace and white hand embroidery. The bridesmaid gown was pale pink silk mull. The bride carried a shower bouquet of lilies of the valley and white lilacs. The bridesmaid carried white lilacs and honeysuckles, the ring being carried in the heart of a calla lily.

The out of town guests were George Cline of Fern, Indiana, futher of the groom, Captain and Mrs. E. E. Chase and Dr. and Mrs. O. E. Chase of Traverse City, and Miss Charlotte Remington of Milwaukee, Miss Harriet Wrisley of Chicago and Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Ruegsegger of Boyne City.

After the ceremony a fine collation was served in the dining-room to a large number of invited guests, after which Mr. and Mrs. Cline took the evening train for southern Indiana and Illinois, where they will remain about ten days.

Mrs. Cline is one of Charlevoix's most prominent young ladies, while Mr. Cline is a valued employe of the D. M. Ferry Seed Company and has during his residence here, taken a leading part in the social, political and business life of our city. They have the best wishes of their many friends.

TO TRAIN PRIESTS

Catholic Theological Seminary Will be Started in Grand Rapids Soon

The new Catholic theological seminary for the diocese of Grand Rapids is to be opened with the beginning of the next school year in September.

For the present the seminary will be located in temporary quarters in the vicinity of St. Andrews' cathedral, but later on it is probable that a large building will be erected on the borders of the city. A number of pieces of property are being considered for the present seminary and it is expected that a decision will be reached in the near future. Among these is the property south of the episcopal residence on Sheldon street.

For the starting of the seminary Bishop Richter now has on hand in the neighborhood of $80,000 in the jubilee fund which was given to him for this purpose upon the occasion of the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his consecration and the founding of the diocese.

For several years a prospective faculty has been in process of preparation both priests and students deemed suitable for places upon it being given special training. Some of the students have been sent to the American college at Rome or the other universities of Europe.

The seminary will be exclusively for candidates for the priesthood. Announcements of the proposed opening of the seminary are being sent throughout the diocese of Grand Rapids so that prospective students may make their plans accordingly.

Christian Scientists Organized

A Christian Science Society was organized in Charlevoix May 24, 1909.

Miss Matelle A. Denton has been chosen as First Reader and R. W. Kane as Second Reader. Regular services will be held in the K. of P. Hall until further notice as follows: Sunday morning at 10:45 and Wednesday evening at 7:45.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY

Pupils Wrote the Eighth Grade Examinations

Results Were Very Gratifying—List of those From Rural Schools.

One hundred sixty students wrote the eighth grade examination in Charlevoix county on May 5-6.

The list of questions this year, while it was a very comprehensive, was considered to be a very fair one.

The results were very gratifying to the teachers of the county in general. The average standing of the pupils this year is somewhat higher than that of previous years, yet a close examination of the records discloses the fact that the work is not so well balanced as that of former years, numerous cases being noted in which the student has earned very high marks in half or more of the subjects while their marks in the others would be so low that we could not issue diplomas.

We do not know whether this is caused by the tendency of the times to specialize or by a weakness on the part of the teacher or pupils in handling certain subjects but we are at a loss to know why a student who can write a paper that is worth 85 per cent in arithmetic and grammar should earn but 12 per cent in geography or why another who earns 97 per cent in arithmetic and 81 per cent in geography should get but 10 per cent in grammar.

Such examples as these kept the number of diplomas granted below what the general work of the applicants would seem to warrant.

In Boyne 23 diplomas were issued, in Charlevoix, while but 5 diplomas were issued, yet 12 of the students passed in every thing excepting civil government, which is a twelfth grade subject in the schools there and the students were not expected to write good papers in that subject.

In East Jordan but part of the class wrote. Seven diplomas were issued and several other students will be allowed to take ninth grade work and make up a subject or two in which they were low.

We will not take the space to print the names of the students from the villages as they will probably be given by the superintendent's reports. The following students from the rural schools were given diplomas.

Ethel Brimhall, Eunice Liskum, Fred Sherman, Mary f. Clark, Clarence Meggison, Paul Bathke, Bernice May Stephens, Chas. J. Allers, Beulah Howe, Don Schleinz, Roy Winkler, Thomas Seroggie, Hazel Myers, Roy Flora, Hazel Lanway, Ida Milton, Verna Fincout, Hazel Gilmartin, Louis Flanders, Edith Stothard, Ray M. Karcher, Willard Howe, Maggie Spura, Fred Erlnurth, Julia May Gibson, Forest Pratt, Lawrence J. Malloy, Amy L. Smith, Ida C. Wiseman, Bertha Ecker, Nina Harper, Attie Ecker, Willie Dunham, Lawrence Wenver.

In issuing diplomas, the board has been very conservative.

A good many others were very near the mark and we hope that we have not discouraged anyone. We feel, however, that to give a diploma that is not earned is a more serious mistake than to with hold one that has come very near the passing mark.

Respectfully,
J. H. MILFORD, Com.

GRAND TRAVERSE BAPTISTS

Hold Successful Meeting at Traverse City Last Week

Charlevoix Prominent in Choice of Officers—Next Year's Meeting at Harbor Springs

The meeting of the Grand Traverse Baptist Association held at Traverse City last week was largely attended, prominent Baptists being present from all portions of the state who gave inspiring and helpful adresses. Charlevoix was represented by live delegates and was recognized by the election of Mrs. F. Dewey Ehle as president of the Woman's section, Verne Norton as vice president of the B. Y. P. U. and A. B. Fleischer as one of the delegates to the state convention.

The next meeting of the association will be held at Harbor Springs the second Wednesday and Thursday in June. W. O. Stovall and F. Dewey Ehle were selected as preachers.

The election of association officers resulted as follows:

Moderator—W. O. Stovall.

Clerk—S. J. Hall.

Bible School Superintendent—Charles Wolfe.

Delegates to the state convention, to be held at Alpena in October; W. O. Stovall, A. B. Fleischer, B. McDermand.

The B. Y. P. U. elected the following officers:

President—H. W. Dunn.

Vice-president—Verne Norton.

Secretary—Miss Margaret Munger.

Junior Leader—Miss Nettie Swanson.

Officers selected by the Woman's section follow:

President—Mrs. F. Dewey Ehle.

Vice-president—Mrs. J. L. Gibbs.

Recording secretary—Mrs I. W. Knight.

Home mission secretary—Mrs. Kittie Bare Cooper.

Foreign mission secretary—Mrs. J. Creller.

NO MORE INDIAN PENNIES

In August Lincoln Cent Will Make Appearance

The new Lincoln pennies will be distributed the first week in August. They will supplant the penny with the familiar Indian head upon it. A stock of the new coin is now being accumulated, and as soon as it is large enough to supply all parts of the country at the same time the pennies will be handed out to the public. The Lincoln design is the work of Victor D. Brenner, a New York sculptor. A number of proofs of the new cent dies have been examined by Director of the Mint Leach and have been found to be satisfactory.

The Lincoln penny will remain in circulation for 25 years. The law forbids more than one exchange in the design of a coin in each period of a quarter of a century.

The next coin to undergo alterations will be the nickle. The time limit of the present design has expired, but as it gives general satisfaction there has been no disposition to supplant it.

The $20 gold double eagles of the famous Roosevelt design are selling at great premiums. The high relief design which was withdrawn because the coin could not be "stacked" sell anywhere for from $40 to $60 each.—Brooklin Eagle.

TEACHERS' EXAMINATION

The regular examination will be held in the high school building in the City of Charlevoix on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, June 17, 18, 19, beginning at 8:30 a. m. standard time.

The examination in reading will be based on "Lady of the Lake."

Certificates of grades will be issued from this examination. Applicants wishing their papers sent to other counties will write with pen, others may write with pencil.

All applicants will be supplied with paper.

212 J. H. Milford, Commissioner.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Of Agricultural Society Met at East Jordan, June 5

Elect Superintendents and Revise Premium List—Fair September 28-30.

A meeting of the Board of Directors of the Charlevoix County Agricultural society was held at East Jordan, June 5, those in attendance being Messrs. Richard Lewis, Nat Burns and E. B. Ward, of Charlevoix, George Heaton and J. A. Newville, of Boyne City, Herbert Olney, M. H. Rhuling, J. H. Lanway, Robert Price and Secretary A. B. Nicholas, jr., of East Jordan.

In the forenoon a trip was made out to the fair grounds, where it was found that very little repairs on fences and buildings would be necessary to put same in good condition for the fair this fall, the dates for which are September 28, 29 and 30. The principal change recommended was the placing of hitching posts in the field in the center of the race track so that teams hitched to them will not obstruct the view of those who cannot find seats in the grand-stand and yet are desirous of witnessing the races.

In the afternoon the matter of revising the premium list was taken up and some few changes made. $1.00 was added to the first and second premiums in Division D (sheep) and three new varieties of apples were added to the list of those eligible to receive premiums, viz: Wolf River, Northwestern Greening and Yellow Bellflower. As a measure of economy in the matter of room it was decided to limit the grange exhibits to 300 plates each and the grain exhibits will be in one-fourth bushels instead of one-half bushels as heretofore.

Another important change was an amendment to the by-laws providing that all exhibitors must purchase membership ticket or that such a ticket must be held by the head of the family.

The following superintendents were elected for the coming fair:

General superintendent—Herbert Olney.

Div. A—Horace Hipp.

B—Nat. Burns.

C—George Heaton.

D—George Heaton.

E—J. H. Lanway.

F—J. H. Lanway.

G—H. C. Barber and O. D. Smith.

H—J. A. Newville and W. J. Saunders.

I—Mrs. Robert Price and Mrs. Clarissa Heaton.

J—Mrs. M. Ruhling and Mrs. D. S. Payton.

K—Mrs. Robert Price and Mrs. Clarissa Heaton.

L—E. B. Ward.

M—J. H. Milford.

N—Wm. Mears, George Madden, W. E. French and Leroy Sherman.

The association is in excellent condition financially and prospects were never brighter for a successful fair than they are this year.

SUCCESSFUL MEETING

Held By Old Settlers at Traverse City Last Week.

The meeting of the Grand Traverse region Old Settler's association held at Traverse City Wednesday of last week, was the most successful meeting ever held.

Election of officers resulted as follows:

President—W. S. Anderson, Traverse City.

Secretary—E. O. Ladd, Peninsula.

Treasurer—O. E. Powers, Elk Rapids.

Historian—Mrs. Fannie Sherman, Traverse City.

Vice presidents—H. O. Rose, Emmet county; George Craker, Leelanau county; Capt. O. E. Wilbur, Charlevoix county; Ira Case, Benzie county; A. K. Dougherty, Antrim county; A. E. Palmer, Kalkaska county, and W. Smith, Grand Traverse county.

DIES SUDDENLY

John LaVeau, a Well Known Resident of Torch Lake.

John LaVean, a resident of Torch Lake Village, aged 62 years, and a veteran of the civil war, fell dead in L. L. Ball's grocery store at Eastport about five o'clock Tuesday afternoon.

The immediate cause of death was dropsy, from which LaVean has been suffering for some time.

With his wife he had gone to Eastport with his pension money received yesterday to pay his three month's grocery bill, Mrs. LaVean thinking the drive would do him good. He was talking to friends, had just told a story and was laughing when he fell.

He leaves only his widow and it is not known if he has any relatives anywhere.

The funeral occurred Wednesday at Eastport Baptist church, Rev. Knight, the pastor officiating. Burial at Eastport cemetery.

ELOQUENT ADDRESS

Was That Given by Professor G. R. Catton

On "The Opportunity of Youth" at Commencement Exercises.

Wednesday and Thursday evenings the commencement exercises of the Charlevoix high school took place at the Charlevoix theater.

Wednesday evening the class day exercises were given by different members of the class who demonstrated that the Charlevoix high school is not only superior in the field of athletics but in the line of school work as well.

Thursday evening the regular commencement was given at the same place, Professor G. R. Catton Benzonia, delivering the address, taking for his subject "The Opportunity of Youth." Given this subject on this occasion, and a speaker of Dr. Catton's ability, and all who have ever heard him, need no assurance to convince them that no more eloquent commencement address was ever heard in our city.

This also was the last class that will go out from the Charlevoix schools under the supervision of Mr. Woodley and the high standard which they have set in all lines of effort, is the best tribute we can give to his work.

The evidence lies before us that the students who graduate from Charlevoix schools are filling responsible positions in life and no better class ever went forth to higher institutions of learning or to light the battle of life than the class of '09.

In all But Three Counties.

Local option is to be an issue next spring in every county in the state that is eligible except Wayne, Bay and Saginaw. This was decided upon at a Lansing by the anti-saloon league a couple of weeks ago, which was called for the purpose of perfecting plans for the campaign and the securing of petitions.

Counties that defeated the proposition last spring cannot vote on the question again for two years.

Retail Coal Dealers.

PROVED THEIR TITLE CLEAR

Charlevoix High School Base Ball Team Did Last Week

BY DEFEATING BOYNE CITY TEAM

Saturday Repeated the Trick With Bellaire

Have Taken Everything in Sight in Foot Ball, Base Ball and Track Meets This Season.

The Charlevoix high school base ball team cinched their title as champions of Northern Michigan, by the games played Friday and Saturday. Friday's game with Boyne City, was won by the Charlevoix team by a score of 9 to 6.

Charlevoix again demonstrating that they grow stronger as the game progresses. The game while devoid of festures, was a fine exhibition of the national game. Batteries; Charlevoix, Poole and Krulick: Boyne City, Robertson and Silverstein.

Saturday's game with Bellaire was poorly attended. The Bellaire team was plainly outclassed by the Charlevoix champions, and a tiresome exhibition was put up. Hits and runs prolonged the game until a score of 17 to 6 was piled up in Charlevoix's favor.

This ends the season, Charlevoix having won eight games and lost one—a percentage of 888. The only flaw on their title of champions of Northern Michigan rests in their not yet having met Traverse City and an effort is now being made to bring the two teams together when a pretty contest would take place.

Not only in base ball has Charlevoix proved its superiority in the athletic field, but, during the football season, they won six games out of the seven played—a percentage of 857.

Both the dual track meet at East Jordan and the North Michigan meet at Petoskey was won by Charlevoix by large percentages.

TWO CHILDREN INJURED

By Explosion of Dynamite, Caps at Norwood, Wednesday

Floyd Parsons, aged six years, son of George Parsons, of Norwood, Eber, a young son of Ethan Joliffe, Lola, little daughter of George Peebles, were actors Wednesday in a near-tragedy.

The children, who are cousins were playing about Parsons' tool house, and found a couple of dynamite caps in a tool chest. One was given the little girl while the two boys tried the other on the grindstone, Eber Joliffe, turning the stone, while Floyd Parsons held the cap, resulting in an explosion which shattered the stone. Floyd's hand was badly torn and his face severely burned and disfigured. Young Joliffe was slightly burned and one hand injured but not seriously. Attending physician thinks Parsons boy will recover without losing his eyesight, though there is still a question about it. The little girl was uninjured. That all were not killed is a miracle.

BUSINESS CHANGE

S. H. Smith Purchases the Meat and Grocery Store of H. D. Marshall

S. H. Smith, the well known Antrim street grocer, has purchased the grocery and meat stock and business of H. D. Marshall, located at the corner of State and Antrim streets and will consolidate both stores at the last point.

This will give Mr. Smith more room, and, at the same time, by the addition of the meat department, which will be in charge of Art Staley, will give him a complete table supply house, enabling him to supply his large list of customers with every thing in the meat and grocery line.

Mr. Marshall is undecided in regard to his future movements.
